Uncertain future

DOME NEGOTIATIONS: An Orthodox Jew walks past the Dome of the Rock in the Old City of Jerusalem. One of the key issues to be resolved in the ongoing peace negotiations is the fate of the area known as the Temple Mount, the site of the biblical temples.For further coverage, please see page 23. [RNS/Reuters photos]

Suitcase rekindles lost memories

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a glass case in a museum in Tokyo, a battered old suitcase sits on display. Though surrounded by photos, written material and videos that tell a broader story of the Jewish experience in the Holocaust, the suitcase has a magnetic appeal to the museum's young visitors.

Moved by the ghosts it contains, children and young teens are inspired to write stories and poems about its owner, and to use it as a starting point in performance art about the Holocaust. The suitcase bears the name of Hannah Brady, a 13-year-old girl from Moravia who did not survive Auschwitz after being transported there from Theresienstadt in October 1944.

For George Brady, the suitcase is a jolt from the past, a tangible link to a time and place he still finds difficult to discuss. He had heard about the suitcase from friends who had seen it at the State Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau, but when he travelled to Poland two years ago, it was no longer on display.

In August, a letter arrived from Japan, explaining it was on loan in the Tokyo Holocaust Education and Resource Centre. Through an unlikely series of coincidences, the director of the centre had tracked him down and was interested in hearing Hannah's story, as well as his own.

Even today it is hard for Brady to talk about the letter and what it means to him. The letter, the suitcase, the memories from the past are bitter reminders that his little sister did not survive the selection process at the gates of Auschwitz.

"I felt responsible to take care of my sister. I couldn't do so. She went to the cellar room," he says, choking back tears.

Though he last saw his sister 56 years ago, he has never forgotten her. His only daughter, Lara Hana, is named in part for her, and last year a number of unlikely coincidences occurred that brought his sister to the forefront of his life.

Bombings threaten to undermine peace plan—please see page 23

The News in Brief

While The CJN took a short break, history continued to unfold around the world. This week's News in Brief takes a look a some of the events that occurred in the past few weeks.

ISRAEL

Suicide Bombing

JERUSALEM — Hamas claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing near a roadside restaurant in the Jordan Valley on Dec. 22 in which three Israeli soldiers were wounded, two of them seriously. Hamas said the suicide bomber was a 22-year-old student from Hebron.

Arabs Threatened

JERUSALEM — Leaflets threatening Israeli Arabs with hanging if they vote in Israel's upcoming election were distributed in Arab communities and published in an advertisement in a leading Israeli Arab newspaper. The announcements reportedly were signed by a formerly unknown group called the Nasserist Movement.

Illegal Adoptions

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are investigating an illegal adoption ring involving women from Russia and Ukraine allegedly brought to Israel to give birth and then sell their babies to barren Israeli couples.

Ketubot Online

JERUSALEM — Hebrew University's collection of illustrated ketubot, or Jewish marriage contracts, can be viewed online at http://jnul.huji.ac.il. The collection includes more than 1,200 original ketubot from 60 different countries, over a period of more than 900 years.

Ties in Trouble

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak warned his cabinet that Israel's relations with Egypt and Jordan could be in jeopardy if Israel fails to reach a peace deal soon with the Palestinians.

Palestinian Workers

JERUSALEM — Israel allowed some Palestinians to return to jobs in Israel in a further easing of sanctions. In late December, the state gave permission to 10,000 Palestinians to return to their jobs, but only 1,000 did so.

WORLD

Victor Borge Dies

WASHINGTON — Victor Borge, a comedic pianist and Jewish refugee from Hitler's Europe, died Saturday at the age of 91. Borge, who made a career of falling off piano stools and getting tangled up in sheet music, was a stage and screen idol in Denmark before he left in 1940.

Testimony Supported

RAVENSBURG, Germany — A Holocaust survivor has corroborated a key element in the testimony of retired Concordia University professor Adalbert Lallier. Richard Loewy, 72, told the court prosecuting ex-SS officer Julius Viel that he remembered a day in 1945 when he had to remove six or seven bodies of slain inmates at an anti-tank ditch near Theresienstadt. Lallier had testified that he saw Viel shoot the prisoners, but Loewy's testimony is the first corroboration of the shooting.

Yahoo! Appeal

WASHINGTON — In a U.S. court, Yahoo! appealed a French court ruling that it must limit French residents' access to auction sites where Nazi memorabilia are sold. Lawyers for the Internet portal claim it is impossible for them to block certain users from accessing information, but a French panel of Internet experts disagreed.

Noble Gesture

BERLIN — A Jewish art dealer handed over his collection of Picassos and other works of art to Germany for a fraction of their worth. Heinz Berggruen, 86, escaped Hitler's death camps by fleeing his native Berlin in 1936, and later became a successful art dealer in Paris. In an act of reconciliation with the country he once fled, he turned over the works for $115 million. Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, who attended the ceremony, called Berggruen's act "an extraordinarily noble, humane gesture."

Public Shame

LONDON — In an apparent effort to shame a husband into changing his mind, a British rabbi publicly named a man who refused to grant his wife a religious divorce. In what is believed to be the first action of its kind in Britain, Rabbi Pini Dunner named the man in an ad in the London Jewish Chronicle.

Sister: Wallenberg Information Lacking

NEW YORK — The sister of Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg, who saved tens of thousands of Hungarian Jews during World War II, is not satisfied by the results of a Russian inquiry into his death. Nina Lagergren said the Dec. 22 statement – that Wallenberg died in a Soviet prison camp – is incomplete because it did not give the cause of his death. The statement did say that Wallenberg was "arrested without grounds" and "repressed by Soviet authorities for political reasons."

Teaching Holocaust through the eyes of a survivor

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was in a Dutch concentration camp that Anita Mayer met Anne Frank.

"And from there, we travelled together to Auschwitz," Mayer told the grade 6 and 7 classes of the Toronto Heschel School.

The Heschel school students, who are currently reading The Diary of Anne Frank, were drawn into Mayer's world as she described her life in hiding and then in the concentration camps.

"I shared a bunk with Anne and her sister in Westerbork, a concentration camp in eastern Holland," Mayer said. "But it was hard to get to know Anne.

"There were four of them travelling together [Anne, her sister Margot, Mrs. Frank and Mrs. Van Pelz], and I was on my own.

"So when Mrs. Frank asked me to join her, I accepted."

Mayer explained that Van Pelz probably used the name of Van Daan while in hiding, which is how Anne refers to the family in her diary.

Mayer, who was honoured recently in Ottawa as part of a group of 55 survivors, read several passages to the students from her own book, One Who Came Back.

In one passage, Mayer describes Margot as the more outgoing of the two Frank sisters. "Anne was the serious quiet one who did very little talking, a tall pretty girl who looked very mature for her age."

After several days at Birkenau, Mayer separated from the Frank family when she decided to join a different sleeping box in order to remain with a friend.

Later, Anne and Margot Frank and Mrs. Van Pelz went to Bergen-Belsen, where they died. Mrs. Frank remained in Birkenau and died during the winter.

In many ways, Anne's life was similar to mine, Mayer told the students. "But I lived on. The future was with me."

Mayer described her initial feelings about the war to the group of students who were only a bit younger than she and Anne were when the war began.

"I was 14 when the war started. We were young, and at first we felt the war was a good thing. Our parents lived through World War I, and now we could have our very own war to live through.

"But that feeling passed very quickly."

The Jewish view of peace

From the editor's desk

Readers of The CJN will be familiar with Prof. Martin I. Lockshin. His essays have appeared from time to time in these pages. His most recent contribution was a thoughtful, creative work, in the voice of King David, about the capital city of Jerusalem, in our Rosh Hashanah supplement.

Lockshin teaches at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University in Toronto. He is an original, insightful thinker, a concise writer and, as his students and colleagues will attest, an individual of integrity, principle and conscience.

It was therefore with particular delight that I retrieved and re-read an article he had written entitled Pursuing Opportunities for Shalom in the World: A Jewish View (from the collection of essays World Order for a New Millennium: Political, Cultural and Spiritual Approaches to Building Peace, A. Walter Dorn, ed., St. Martin's Press).

The article was not written against the backdrop of the ongoing rejectionist riots – I received it almost a year ago. I have not discussed the current situation with Prof. Lockshin and do not know his interpretation of current events. But because of the riots, the anxiety and the anger and the uncertainty they have engendered, I decided to re-read Lockshin's essay in order to return to first principles, as it were, concerning the traditional Jewish view on peace.

As of this writing, the situation in the Middle East is extremely "fluid," a euphemism for rapid change and relatively little predictability.

In the military arena, violence still rages. Palestinians shoot at Jews in the West Bank and Gaza on a daily basis. The IDF retaliates in a selective rather than a generalized manner.

In the diplomatic arena, Israelis and Palestinians have resumed negotiations in Washington with Bill Clinton close at hand, even as the violence continues in the streets.

In the political arena, Israelis will be voting on Feb. 6 for a prime minister. The vote will be a referendum on the peace process – where it should be headed, how it should get there and with whom.

Thus, with the details of peace achingly absent, it is fair to ask: is the idea and the ideal of pursuing peace still a balm for the Jewish soul? Or does our anger and our distrust of the Palestinian leadership place the pursuit into an alternate perspective?

Lockshin poses this question concerning peace at the outset of the essay: is peace God's task or is it ours?

He begins the search for the answer by tracing the references to peace (shalom) in the biblical and rabbinic sources. There are 237 instances in which "shalom" appears in the Bible, Lockshin notes. These references, however, may not have a single uniform meaning. But "in later classical rabbinic Hebrew… shalom unequivocally means peace, although it can mean either peace between nations or between individual human beings. Furthermore, . in rabbinic Judaism shalom is virtually an unrivaled value."

Lockshin briefly discusses the value of shalom in rabbinic Judaism, pointing out that to underscore the unambiguous pre-eminence of peace as a value, the rabbis resorted to very strong language and homiletics.

The ancient sages taught that the command to pursue peace "differs from most of the other laws in the Bible."

"Most of the commands of the Bible are casuistic in style (If… then)," Lockshin writes, "implying that they apply only in a specific set of circumstances… but shalom is different. The Bible commands us to seek peace and to pursue opportunities of making peace in this world… Concerning peace, 'seek it' when it is close to you and 'pursue it' when it is somewhere else."

Lockshin refutes the cynical contention that our ancient rabbis valued shalom highly only as a function of the powerlessness of the Jewish people during Mishnaic and Talmudic times.

"The most famous and moving texts about peace," Lockshin retorts, "come from biblical times, from the days of the Jewish monarchy, from the days of Jewish power."

Lockshin concludes his essay by reminding readers that to the classical rabbis, shalom was so important that it was regarded even as one of God's names.

"Seeking shalom therefore means seeking God. God for rabbinic Jews is not sought solely by sitting in synagogue or by studying texts," Lockshin writes. As proof, he quotes Rabbi Simon ben Elazar: "If people sit at home and are silent, how can they be considered to be pursuing peace?"

To the question is peace God's task or is it ours, Lockshin answers: "Based on the Jewish sources… it is safe to say that the Jewish answer is both. We must work for peace as well as pray for it."

Lockshin's essay is a powerful statement and an important reminder during this critical period of Jewish history.

Despite our anger, despite our distrust, we are obliged to "pursue" peace, though it may be somewhere else, far away.

JVS employees return to work

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After almost two months on strike, Jewish Vocational Service (JVS) employees belonging to CUPE local 2137 went back to work on Dec. 18.

"We're thrilled that the strike is over," said Karen Goldenberg, JVS' executive director.

The 80 employees involved in the strike provide job counselling, educational and vocational services to Jewish and non-Jewish clients.

After offers, counter-offers, and at least two stalemates over issues of salaries and Jewish holidays, a settlement was reached on Dec. 17.

The new two-year collective agreement, replacing the previous one which expired March 31, includes a three percent pay increase over two years – one percent effective Apr. 1, 2000, and a further one percent Apr. 1, 2001 and and Mar. 31, 2002 respectively.

Employees will also receive seven Jewish holidays off with pay – Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and the first two and last two days of Passover. Previously both Jewish and non-Jewish employees were entitled to up to 13 days off per year with pay, even if the Jewish holidays fell on weekdays.

Management has also committed to "respect everyone's observance," said Goldenberg, meaning employees who want to observe other religious holidays will also receive time off.

"I guess the staff felt that a compromise was necessary," said Tia De Agazio, CUPE Local 2137 president and an employment consultant with JVS' youth program.

"I think we were very unhappy to lose the six Jewish holidays. I think that was kind of a blow, but we know that in order to go back that's what we had to do."

The agency is "committed to working with employees to find positive pathways of communication and build a strong organization that will be respectful of religious observance," said Goldenberg, adding that they have struck a Jewish identity task force to be composed of board members and staff.

Other after-effects of the strike include an upcoming opportunity for staff to work overtime on certain programs as well as the possibility of short-term recruitment, Goldenberg said. Funding and fee schedules will also be addressed, she added.

There are still "raw feelings," she noted, but said the first day back included "lots of hugs" in addition to "a little reticence."

Teaching the Holocaust through a survivor's eyes

Mayer showed the students the yellow star that she was forced to wear and a handmade flashlight that she used at night.

The situation got worse for her and her family, and her father decided to go into hiding.

They remained in hiding in a shelter constructed underneath their dining-room in Tilburg, Holland for 18 months.

On Aug. 2, 1944, shortly after 10 p.m., the Nazis arrived at their hiding place and within minutes, Mayer and her family were arrested.

Mayer and the Heschel school students discussed her memories of the concentration camps.

"What was Auschwitz like?" one student asked.

"Bad, very bad," Mayer told the attentive group.

"Once a day, we were given some soup. Once a day, we were given a piece of bread. And once a week, we were given a bit of butter.

"I was always, always, always, thirsty. We were only given something to drink, which was brownish-greenish, once a day.

"And I worked so hard. In the camps, I did about every heavy job under the sun."

Mayer told the group about the emotional moment when the SS officers separated her from her mother and her grandmother.

"I tried to look back, but I couldn't see them. I never saw them again."

On that same day, she saw her brother Bernd for only a minute outside the shower-rooms in Birkenau.

" 'Always remember,' he said to me, 'the Nazis can hurt you from the outside, but not from the inside.' "

"I realized that if you weren't hopeful, you couldn't survive," Mayer said. "You needed inner strength and friendship in order to survive."

When her camp was liberated, Mayer travelled back to Holland, where she got married and had her first child.

"In 1951, we decided to immigrate to Canada, moving first to Montreal and then to Prescott, Ont., for 45 years."

Mayer, who has two daughters and four grandchildren, moved to Toronto two years ago.

One student asked Mayer if she has ever been back to Holland.

"Many times," she told the group.

"And what is it like when you go back? Is it still the same?

"Time moves on," Mayer said. "Nothing ever stays the same."

CHAT students help launch international newspaper

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One student said "Gesher." Another suggested "Kesher." In no time, they had a name for a new, international Hebrew-language newspaper being written by high school students from Canada, Israel and the United States.

Gesher Lakesher (Bridge to the Connection) is the brainchild of Israela Shaked, a former journalist in Israel who now teaches Hebrew and journalism at Solomon Schechter Day School in West Orange, New Jersey. She hopes to make the newspaper project an annual event.

The American school recently hosted 50 day school students for a three-day conference to get the project off the ground.

Participants, most of whom attend the Conservative movement's Solomon Schechter day schools, heard speakers on topics related to Israel and journalism, and visited the Israeli consulate in New York as well as the New York offices of the Israeli daily Ma'ariv.

Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) students Mira Schwartzburg, 17, and Vered Kakzanov, 16 – along with staff member Gila Asor – were the only representatives of a Canadian school.

Asor, who is an adviser for CHAT's biannual Hebrew newspaper, Kol Noar, chose the two girls to participate because of their experience and good ideas, she said. "We want them to see and meet other Jewish students all around the world, to hear their opinions and their way of living. We want them to interact with each other."

That is precisely why she believes the name of the paper is so appropriate. "We want them to build a bridge."

Schwartzburg – a native of Rostov-on-Don who immigrated to Canada two years ago after living in Israel for nine years – believes the paper should include articles on Israeli politics and the peace process, in terms of their effect on teenagers and how the issues connect Jews around the world.

Gesher Lakesher is expected to be about 36 pages long, with features on studying for university entrance exams, similarities and differences among youth in different geographic areas, and tourism items written by the students about their respective hometowns.

The first edition is expected to be out before Israeli Independence Day at the end of April. Enough copies will be printed for all students at participating schools. There will also be an online edition.

CHAT's eight-page Hebrew-language school paper also covers Israeli politics, as well as school activities. A new section, Al Banim v'Al Banot (Guys and Girls) was in the works for the Chanukah issue, said Kakzanov, the editor.

Like Schwartzburg, Kakzanov was born in the former Soviet Union (Uzbekistan) and moved to Israel at a young age. She immigrated here in Grade 8, and completed junior high at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Not all the contributors to Kol Noar are from Israel, she noted.

The two friends met in a drama class at CHAT. "All the Hebrew-speaking kids [at the school] know each other," said Kakzanov. They estimate there are about 30 CHAT students who came here from Israel.

Many of their peers at the New Jersey conference were not Israeli, they noted. They were particularly impressed by the host school's Hebrew newspaper.

"They do it with Ma'ariv. It's very professional," said Kakzanov. "Ours is very simple, but the content is just as good."

Cummer Lodge's spiritual leader says goodbye

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Carl Rees, 71, volunteer spiritual leader of Shabbat services at Cummer Lodge, is retiring but is already training his successors.

Rees, whose mother Bertha, 94, is a resident, has been conducting services every second and fourth Saturday, with the help of his wife Germaine, for 11 years.

"It's been a lot of blood, sweat and tears, and I'm ready to give it up," he said.

About one-quarter of the 400 residents at the lodge are Jewish, and 50 to 60 come to services, Rees said.

He is training volunteers Zev Laszlo and Neena Lurie to take over the services, which he divides into two parts, the first leading up to Torah reading.

Retired after 50 years as a jewelry retailer, Rees also attends classes at the York University's Institute of Judaism.

The Torah, originally from Germany, was bought from a Florida synagogue with $5,000 that was raised by volunteers.

Previously, they had used a Torah loaned to them by the Beaches Hebrew Institute which had to be returned for the High Holy Days.

Neil Winokur, 15, a high school student who attends Hebrew classes, often carries the Torah around to residents. "His devotion is wonderful to see," said Rees. Among other volunteers, who bring the residents to services and return them to their rooms, are Esther Denver, Louis Leader, Muriel Rosen, Terry Laszlo, and Joe Black.

Associated Hebrew Schools holds citizenship court

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Grade 5 students at Associated Hebrew Schools had a visual aid to their social studies curriculum recently.

Forty people, representing eight cultures and nationalities, took the oath of citizenship at a special session of the Court of Canadian Citizenship, presided over by Judge Sigmund Reiser.

Several others, including Vaughan councillor Susan Kadis and Canadian Jewish Congress president Moshe Ronen, re-affirmed their Canadian citizenship.

The event was held at the Kamin Education Centre at Thornhill, and was witnessed by the new Canadians' families and friends and by over 200 Grade 5 students from the Kamin and Posluns branches of the school.

The oath and the National Anthem, sung at the end of the program, were in both English and French.

An extra touch of colour was added by the kilts and Scottish dress uniforms of Captains Benjamin Greenaway and John Cottrell of the 78th Fraser Highlanders, who escorted Judge Reiser.

Associated communications specialist Adina Abramov told The CJN that the ceremony "gave you a good feeling about being a Canadian."

Reiser, she said, called Canada "the land of opportunity," saying that he himself had gone from being a manual labourer going to school at night, to being a judge.

"He stressed the importance of education, and he was speaking to the kids as much as to the immigrants."

The students were moved, she said, and after the ceremony many went up and congratulated the new citizens.

Many of the new citizens were from cultures that Jewish youngsters would not ordinarily come in contact with, Abramov said, such as those from Iran, Pakistan and the far east.

"The judge stressed that everyone should remember that they are Canadians first, and they should leave old prejudices including racial and religious ones, and violence behind. He said that here everyone is equal, and each person can make a difference."

After the ceremony, while the participants mingled at a reception, the students stayed behind for a question and answer session with Judge Reiser.

So successful was the event, Abramov said, that the school is considering doing it again.

It's not about Jews; it's about values

This newspaper has never recoiled from criticizing or condemning as warranted, even harshly, the policies and statements of Premier Lucien Bouchard. It will also never recoil from commending him as warranted. Last month, Bouchard enunciated and stood firm on a position of principle regarding the behaviour of Yves Michaud, an aspirant to the National Assembly as the Parti Québécois candidate from the riding of Mercier.

The premier deserves the highest praise for having done this.

Last month, on a number of occasions, Michaud uttered dubious remarks about the Jewish people, including nasty comments about B'nai Brith, about alleged Jewish attitudes towards others' sufferings and about "ethnic" voting preferences against sovereignty.

When Michaud's statements became public, Bouchard responded immediately, forcefully and unambiguously. He criticized Michaud and the substance of Michaud's regrettable opinions.

Subsequently, the Quebec legislative assembly passed a resolution reprimanding Michaud's odious views.

The motion in the assembly evoked a firestorm of opposition from a number of prominent sovereigntists, who, in a full-page ad in Le Devoir, accused the assembly of denying Michaud his right to freedom of speech. But the premier stood his ground, spurning the man and his opinions.

Refusing to allow the matter to simply subside quietly into the distractions of the holiday period, Michaud made public a letter he sent to the premier. In it, Michaud reiterated his views, accused the premier of attempted political assassination and demanded an apology from him.

Again, Bouchard remained resolute in his abject rejection of the views Michaud was attempting now to softpedal. To his great credit, Bouchard pointed out that the offence and the danger in Michaud's remarks are twofold: substantively repugnant, groundless and defamatory towards the Jewish people; and symbolically, a violation of the values of tolerance, inclusion and diversity that are the true and precious underpinnings of all democracies.

"What will we say of a political party that promotes the sovereignty of Quebec, that wants to build a democratic country, if it maintains a discourse that attacks... Quebec's ethnic communities?" the premier asked.

By contrast, Jacques Parizeau showed once again why people continue to be wary of his vision of a sovereign Quebec. "What Mr. Michaud said was clumsy... But there is nothing in what he said to make a fuss about." Nothing indeed!

Bouchard wisely understands that "l'affaire Michaud" is not about the Jews. It is about the values Quebec must stand for if it wants people from around the world to give it its independent blessing.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Government ad painful

Once again, I was dismayed to see the Chanukah greetings of Premier Mike Harris and his caucus published in The CJN (Dec. 21). It pains me that this is the third Chanukah in a row that I find it necessary to write such a letter of complaint to your newspaper. Chanukah is the holiday that marks the miraculous survival of the Jewish religion despite adversity. Harris and his caucus, by ignoring the United Nations human rights committee's resolutions regarding educational funding in Ontario, and by continuing in their refusal to recognize the educational rights of our community, are actively involved in thwarting the very Jewish continuity that Chanukah celebrates. Until this inequitable and unjust situation is corrected, it would be most appropriate for The CJN to reject any such festival greetings from the provincial government.

Saddened by students' behaviour

Re "Anti-Israel vote fails at Concordia U" (Dec. 7, 2000). I find the position that Hillel and certain Jewish students of Concordia University have taken towards the state of affairs in Israel quite sad.

A slogan such as "Keep foreign policy out of our university," as displayed on Hillel placards according to The CJN report, not only attempts to extinguish debate on societal affairs in our school systems but also attempts to reduce the student to a passive receptacle of hierarchical learning by a so-called school autonomous from the real world.

I would also like to take issue with the slogan advanced by Hillel and other Concordia – presumably Jewish – students that stated, "An attack on the Jewish State is an attack on Jews." Such a slogan makes it impossible to distinguish the activities of a nation-state and the people that live under a nation-state.

While I fully support Hillel and student opinion on the given issue, I find it shameful that some of the students who did participate in the debate at the vote reduced their participation to jeering. I hope they recognize the importance of deliberation and debate in solving problems that we face.

Tourists required

We recently returned from an extended trip to Israel. To our great relief, we found a country going about its business as usual. What we did not find, however, were tourists. Depending on your source, tourism is down between 60 and 90 percent. Hotels and tourist sites are as empty as restaurants. Shops regularly display 50 to 70 percent off and actually mean it. Economically, the country is suffering.

Nevertheless, security in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and even Jordan is tight and efficient. Incidents which are undoubtedly staged to cause maximum political, economic and personal suffering are quickly contained. The country continues its routine in an assured manner.

So where are Israel's supporters? At this time, our financial and emotional support are not enough – our physical presence is required. Israel must see us.

For those individuals who have never been to Israel, there has never been a better time. Airline and hotel prices are at an all time low; historical and religious sites remain safe and accessible. For those who have visited Israel previously, go now once again. Your people need you.

The Poet as Witness: Simcha Simchovitch at Eighty

By ADAM FUERSTENBERG

Toronto has a treasure in its midst, an oyzer. The treasure is our Toronto wordsmith, the poet Simcha (Sam) Simchovitch.

On Jan. 15, Simchovitch will celebrate his 80th birthday and almost 55 years of creative literary work in three languages, Yiddish, Hebrew and English. It is an occasion for celebration and for an appreciation of his impressive achievement.

Simchovitch is an exceptional figure in Canadian Jewish literature, and in Canadian literature in general. In three generations of noted Canadian Yiddish poets, he is the only one who has made a smooth transition to English, skillfully translating many of his own richly evocative Yiddish poems into lyrical English, or sometimes writing original English verse.

Appearing frequently in the Forward and other Yiddish journals and papers all over the world, Simchovitch has an international Yiddish reading public. Fellow poets especially, even non-Jews, admire this gentle, self-effacing lyrical craftsman.

In the preface to Simchovitch's latest English publication, The Remnant (Mosaic Press, 1999), renowned Canadian poet Raymond Souster pays him a rare tribute. Comparing Simchovitch's role to that of Paul Celan and Nelly Sachs as carrying the burden of the Holocaust in their work, Souster writes "[Simcha's] is a voice we should listen to and learn from... My only hope now is that he may be allowed a chance to reach a wider audience he so richly deserves."

When reviewing Simchovitch's English collection, Selected Poems (Mosaic Press, 1990), the great Canadian critic, George Woodcock, founder and longtime editor of the leading literary journal Canadian Literature, wrote, "I like this insightful poet whose 'naïve' visions become true."

Fellow poet James Deahl, in his introduction to Selected Poems, places Simchovitch squarely in the tradition of the great Canadian "people's" poets like Milton Acorn, Dorothy Livesay, and A.M. Klein. He adds, "[Simchovitch's] work relates directly to the central strand of modern Canadian poetry."

Unlike those Canadian poets, however, Simchovitch is not only an observer of the suffering around him, but he also bears witness to the Holocaust. For Simchovitch is foremost a Yiddish poet, part of that wave of Yiddish writers who arrived in Canada after surviving the Holocaust — among them such renowned writers as Rochl Korn, Chava Rosenfarb and Peretz Miransky. Although Simchovitch published a few youthful pieces in Europe, he has developed as a writer and poet almost completely in Canada. His poetry reflects a love of his adopted country which is more intense than that of the other Holocaust writers.

Simcha Yaacov Simchovitch was born in the tiny shtetl of Sobin, Poland, and grew up in the resort town of Otwock, near Warsaw, famed for its healing environment. His family engaged in shoemaking, and he recalls his father and grandfather as hardworking, religious and proud Jews. He imbibed his love of Yiddish at his mother's breast, he writes.

Simchovitch attended cheder at five, and at nine was already adept at Torah studies. He also went to a Polish elementary school. By 15, he was working in the same trade as his father and becoming active in the youth wing of the local Bund. At the outbreak of World War II, he escaped to the Russian part of occupied Poland, then moved to central Russia, eventually ending in Uzbekistan. In Russia, he worked in a factory while completing high school and attending teachers' college.

Simchovitch arrived in Montreal in 1949. At first he worked in a leather shop, then completed the Montreal Jewish Teachers Seminary in 1954, becoming a full-time teacher in Montreal and Ottawa Jewish day schools.

After moving to Toronto to teach and eventually to become the librarian at Beth Tzedec Synagogue and the curator of its Judaica collection, Simchovich completed a BA at the University of Toronto and an MA at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York in 1969. His thesis on 18th-century philosopher Solomon Maimon, in Hebrew, was published in Israel in 1971 to critical appreciation.

It was in Montreal in 1950, that his first Yiddish collection, Azoy iz a Yungt Fargangen (Thus Vanished a Generation) appeared, followed by a second collection, In Sho fun Tfile (In the Hour of Prayer) in 1958. Both were greeted with critical acclaim, but it wasn't until 1989 that his third collection, Tzar un Treist (Sorrow and Consolation), appeared. More recently, however, Simchovitch has been remarkably prolific, publishing eight books — four in English — in almost as many years.

Simchovitch has received numerous awards. Tzar un Treist garnered the J.I. Segal Award in 1990. His autobiographical novel, Stepchild on the Vistula (Lugus, 1994), with a preface by Eli Wiesel, received the Izzy and Betty Kirshenbaum Foundation Prize of Canada's Jewish Book Committee, as did all three of his English and two new Yiddish collections of poetry. In 1999, he was recognized for lifetime achievement with the prestigious Dr. Chaim Zhitlovsky Prize presented by the Yiddish Culture Association (YIKUF) in New York.

There is no doubt that Simchovitch, Chava Rosenfarb and Yehuda Elberg form an elegaic triumvirate of Canadian Yiddish Holocaust writers in Canada. As the poet among them, Simchovitch carries an especially heavy burden of melancholy and tragic song. His first two volumes were clearly Holocaust poetry, showing him to be a talented lyricist with a special ability to recollect and recreate Jewish life in pre-World War II Poland. In moving and beautiful verse, he recalls the warmth and closeness of family life in the poor yet vibrant shtetls of Eastern Europe.

A witness to the tragedy that engulfed Jewry, Simchovitch wants to come to terms with his grief. In his second English volume of poetry, A Song Will Remain (Lugus, 1996), the title poem of the book repeats his lamentations. It is, he writes, his "Song of songs — of suffering/ of anguish, grief, and torment," in the hope that the memory of the six million innocent victims will not die but will be "from generation to generation/ carried like a holy watchword."

But in poems like Autumn Mediations and Merciful Death, the poet tries to plumb the meaning of his experiences and to reconcile to the tragedies that inevitably accompany life, responding to his new life in Canada. In Springtime in the World, At Lake Ontario, Lake Muskoka and Toronto, he is able to celebrate his life here. In Toronto, city of "quiet and tumultuous streets," he writes:

Since I have set foot on your pavements you grew tall and stately, pulsating with throngs of all colours, tongues.

In his "Canadian" poems, Simchovitch reflects on the country's beauty and variety and gratefully expresses his sense of security here and his love of his adopted land.

Whereas A Song Will Remain was greeted as a major literary and cultural event in Canadian Jewish literature, The Remnant only adds to that significant achievement. Again Simchovitch recalls the Holocaust, but the note of reconciliation and revival is more insistent.

Most moving in these later poems is Simchovitch's recollection of his youth and the exurberance and promise of his generation cut off so brutally. It was a generation of idealists who, in spite of poverty, dreamt passionate dreams. In a poem titled Thus a Youth Perished, which appeared as the title poem in Simchovitch's first book, he writes:

How can I forget the glimmer in eyes,
Of those who dreamt of world redemption?...

In towns where need cried out from doors,
They were the solace, the hope and joy.

The book's title, The Remnant, clearly announces that it is a lament. It is not limited, however, only to his Holocaust experiences, for he is moved by two other passions: a deep, abiding humanity expressed in his concern for others — especially the impoverished (as in his poem Ode To My Humble Brethren), and a love of Toronto. In his poem Wonderful City, he combines these two passions and mixes his wonder at Toronto's impressive skyline with an admonition against the poverty in its streets. It is a short and pungent admonition.

You won't cover-up,
Wonderful City,
with your boulevards and palaces the poverty that nests in back alleys, rooming houses, attics, where people languish
in loneliness, in filth.

And you will not redeem,
Wonderful City,
with your galleries and statues
the shame of streetwalkers...

However, the first part of The Remnant is again a deeply-felt elegy to the vanished world of Otwock, and by extension, to all the thousands of Otwocks that Hitler and the Nazis destroyed. Few descriptions of the horror of a ghetto's final liquidation achieve the power of one of the longer poems in the volume, titled The Last Night.

...Over the ghetto lanes panic rises like a threatening cloud, an epidemic that quickly penetrates house after house...
They pack bundles, rucksacks, tie the rumpled bedding,
bury previous heirlooms,
the Sabbath candleholders, menorahs beloved objects of heritage passed down from mothers, grandmothers...

Dawn... fathers, mothers and children
doze on sacks and bundles... with hearts shrunken, in cold sweat, counting the hours and minutes
Suddenly...
The earth trembles with the boom of motors,
the air is pierced with rifle salvos, sirens howl, announcing the final hour of the ghetto.

In the book's title poem, The Remnant, Simchovitch describes Otwock's Jews being shot in groups of 10 and their bodies shoved into the mass graye, as the German soldiers stand nearby:

...Combat boots shining,
the sweat dripping from beneath their helmets,
they hurriedly gulped beer bottles,
engrossed in the slaughter of the remnant, Jews.

Meantime, their Polish neighbours, in their summer dresses and short-sleeved shirts, as if at a summer picnic, "...assembled/ to witness the unholy spectacle/ of the final end to the Otwock Jews."

Still, in spite of the poverty and horror the poet has seen this century, The Remnant is an affirmation of life. At the end of the volume we are offered first, and appropriately, two poems in loving tribute to Simchovitch's wife Freda and to his grandson Michael, followed by the final poem Yes, I do believe, a rousing affirmation of a faith not akin to a facile regurgitated liturgy, but rather to man's essential capacity for goodness and Nature's ever-reviving abundance.

...I affirm my faith in days to come that will uplift mankind from the vale of tears and misery

The poet concludes:

A new reality will dawn, an earthly Eden of life and love, healing and forgiveness.
Poets will express and sing of this felicity —
yes, I do believe, I affirm my steadfast faith.

And indeed, we hope the poet will continue to sing of this felicity for many, many years to come.

Israel and evangelicals

Objective analysts of the North American religious scene agree that evangelical Protestant churches are currently the most successful in their attempts to gather loyal adherents to the faith. They are fundamentalists who believe that their messiah will experience a second coming and that this world-shaking event is just about at hand.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

These fundamentalists refer to various factors in their belief structure, amongst them the biblical promise that at the right time God will bring all Jews from their dispersion to Eretz Yisrael. The arrival of the Christian messiah is therefore believed to be dependent on the ingathering of the Jews, and if that can be hastened, the steps of the messiah himself will be hurried. Meanwhile, the Holy Land is the centre of their hopes, and this leads to some very interesting consequences.

Not only are evangelical Christians amongst the most frequent visitors to Israel, but they are also the greatest political supporters of that country back in the United States.

In a recent Internet article, Prof. Michael Cook of Cincinnati made this observation: Israel needs all the help she can get from any source, including evangelicals, regardless of their religious motivation. This policy has a pragmatic consequence. Many Israeli leaders, says Cook, consider the evangelicals' support as a given. In the long run, they can always be counted upon to "be there" for Israel, but American Jews – while basically pro-Israel – are not considered to be always reliable. Cook points out that when visiting the United States, Israeli dignitaries schedule meetings with evangelical broadcasters, sometimes right before a meeting with the president himself.

Meanwhile, Israel continues to give red carpet treatment (including special defence ministry briefings) to prophecy conferences and to tours led by evangelical leadership. It appears that they, and not North American Jews, are considered the country's most dependable allies. It is an unfortunate and sobering acknowledgment, which is evident not only in ordinary times, but especially in days of crisis.

I am informed that while hotel reservations from North American Jews are way down at this time, when violence once again has become the fate of Palestinian-Israeli confrontation and cancellations are in the thousands, evangelicals continue to go. They go to Israel with confidence, and visit it as the land of promise.

The fact that their ultimate hope is for the conversation of all Jews to Christianity is a matter with which pragmatic Israelis and their politicians are not concerned. It is a world, as far as they can see, in which the day-to-day advantages must be exploited, regardless of their source. It is a situation which should give all of us much pause.

Dedicating ourselves at Chanukah

I love Chanukah.

For years, it has been my favourite holiday. As a child, I think that it would be safe to say that this would have been due to the association of the holiday with gift-receiving and, of course, with the massive amounts of food that we would consume. As I got older, the holiday was further enhanced as I was able to give gifts to my loved ones. I remember spending countless hours deciding what to buy for my family and friends. Half of the fun, of course, was giving the gift and hoping that the receiver would be pleased.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

I am not the type who particularly enjoys receiving presents anymore. To be perfectly honest, I am very picky, and while I always am grateful to those who want to buy me things, I would have just preferred that they make a donation somewhere in my honour.

I always assumed that most families spend Chanukah the way mine has. Usually, the first night my whole family would voraciously devour my mom's prized latkes, something that I look forward to year-round. I cringe when she teases me by saying that maybe this year she will bake them to make them healthier (God forbid!).

We then would get our "big" presents after lighting the chanukiyah (even the dog got one last year) and finally we would spend the rest of the night laughing at my Dad while he blared his old cheesy Chanukah records. Oh, what a night it would be!

The remainder of the holiday would usually be spent getting cute little gifts like annual lottery tickets (that we NEVER win) and eating cold latkes out of the fridge for at least a week.

What made Chanukah even more appealing this year was that my exams were finished so I could actually enjoy the holidays. Once I arrived home, I spent some time with an elderly friend of the family who does not have many relatives. While I was telling him about my eagerness for the holiday, it occurred to me that he was most likely dreading it.

Not considering myself a naive person, I realized I had sadly overlooked something. Many, as I, see Chanukah as a great opportunity to spend some time with family and friends, eat lots of food (a common theme in my column) and exchange gifts. Most of us tend to forget that the holiday can be a painful time for those who are not as fortunate. For some families, financial burdens can be so great that putting food on the table is the first and only priority. For others, this time might remind families about loved ones that are no longer with them.

We have to remember the part of our religion about tzedakah, about taking care of each other. It is up to everyone, be it on campus or in our social activities, to be sensitive and attentive to the needs of others, at this time especially. While I do not mean to put a damper on such a festive holiday, fellow students of all ages, let's put humanity first at Chanukah.

"Humanity" can be interpreted in many ways. For example, for the person who has everything, why not make a donation to your favourite charity instead of buying a perhaps overpriced and impersonal gift? For someone who has lost a family member or is overwhelmed by the holiday, why not call or visit to let them know they are on your mind, that you are there for them?

Plans are afoot for an Adopt-a-Bubby/Zaidy program in Halifax, where university students will be paired up with seniors in the district. The hope of the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Students Federation is that new "families" will be established and both sides will benefit.

In performing mitzvot during Chanukah or any other holiday, we can rejuvenate the spirit of community that the holiday truely stands for. In my case, I have started a tradition with my friends and family. My goal has been to change my perspective of what Chanukah is and approach it from a more intrinsic outlook.

Mitzvot and Chanukah go together well. Chag Sameach.

Students gain unique experience in Israel

As I sit here writing my first article for 2001, I am looking out at the Old City of Jerusalem and the magnificent spectacle of the Western Wall. I came to Israel on Dec 14 for three weeks, to visit my girlfriend who is attending Hebrew University.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

With the amazing beauty of this country in full view of the university campus, it seems almost impossible that Israel is in the midst of a fight.

Unfortunately, however, there is a raging conflict taking place in the Holy Land, and it is something that Hebrew U students have to be aware of day in and day out.

Many people in Winnipeg ask me what things are like in Israel. Some of their war-related questions are: Is my girlfriend afraid to go out? Does she see the fighting? Is she near the violence?

It is very hard for many people outside of Israel to see that this country is not really war-torn and that every city is not a scene of Arab-Israeli clashes. As many of us know, the media prey upon a few sections of Israel and feed their message to the general population who, in turn, think the fighting is in every crevice of the country. This simply is not the case, and students here are relatively free to do as the please.

This does not mean that they are naive or carefree. They are faced with two gripping realities – a feeling of worry that something bad will happen, and the thought that a year to study in Israel is a once in a lifetime opportunity that must be taken advantage of. The latter thought is much stronger than the former for most of the students.

In order to be able to have a once in a lifetime experience though, they have to make a few concessions. They cannot go everywhere they please. For example, going to Gilo or Ramalla may be an unwise choice, as would be a visit to the West Bank. While these places may not be on the must see list for most students in calmer times, the difference now is that if they are driving through the country, then these are places that have to be avoided.

For example, we were going to drive to Safed the other day. We were going to take a route that would pass through Jericho, but since this a heated area, we had to change the highway we would take to get there. This is the type of thing students are faced with. They are modifying their trips to avoid certain places, but they are by no means locking themselves in their rooms, waiting for the next terrorist act.

I think a more important question than how the students are coping, is how can they use Israel's current problems to enhance their experience? Courses are coming to life for these students. Classes dealing with the Arab-Israeli conflict (and there are many of them) are much more real today than they would be in more peaceful times. The students can talk about current events and understand how today's outbreak of violence came to be.

This "hands-on" education puts the situation in a perspective that we Winnipeggers will never get. Knowledge gained from reading Israeli newspapers every day will far outweigh any insight that could be gained from a thick, overpriced textbook that people in Canada purchase for one of their classes.

Life in Israel goes on, and the Arab-Israeli conflict is an intense part of the entire experience that makes up the cultural mosaic of Israel's past, present and future.

Politics and history are on the main stage here, and it is an incredible thing to watch. Just being here for a few days and seeing how the Hebrew U students talk about the issue, has given me a better appreciation of the plight of both Israelis and Arabs, and it has already given me a broader understanding of what this country is facing. It is hard to explain, but the best advice I can give is just to come to Israel to experience the land and the culture, while remaining a little cautious.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books for all tastes...

An eclectic selection of newly-published books...

Abba Eban, Israel's former foreign minister, was the acme of eloquence. In Diplomacy for the Next Century (Yale University Press), a wise and reasoned disquisition on diplomacy during and after the Cold War, he comments on events that have shaped Israel and the region.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Barry Rubin, deputy director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University, is a keen observer of the Middle East. The Transformation of Palestinian Politics (Harvard University Press) is a cogent analysis of the challenges facing the Palestinian Authority today. It was written before the latest Palestinian uprising.

Benjamin Netanyahu, turfed out in 1999, may be back again as Israel's prime minister. His views on the Arab-Israeli dispute are contained in A Durable Peace (Warner).

Michael Livni (Langer) of Vancouver settled on a kibbutz in 1963. Some years later, as the Israeli Reform movement's emissary in the United States, he organized the garin for Kibbutz Yaael in the Negev. In Reform Zionism (Gefen), Livni sets out stimulating ideas on the Progressive Jewish movement in Israel and on Israel's relationship with the Diaspora.

Joseph Agassi, professor emeritus at Tel Aviv University and York University, discusses weighty philosophical issues – Israeli nationality, citizenship and religious identity – in Liberal Nationalism for Israel (Gefen). Since these matters are always of importance, it will be of value to most readers.

In 1948, the American journalist Ruth Gruber wrote Destination Palestine, based on her dispatches and photographs of the 1947 Exodus affair. Now, in a revised and expanded edition, Exodus (Random House), she revisits the famous refugee ship whose odyssey impacted Israel's establishment.

More than 130,000 Iraqi Jews immigrated to Israel from 1949 to 1952, and in To Baghdad and Back (Gefen), Mordechai Ben-Porat, one of the organizers of this mass settlement, recalls the historic operation.

Richard Oestermann, a resident of Israel since 1961, has been around as a journalist. In Born Again (Gefen), he offers a reader 35 human interest stories that personify the complexity and diversity of Israeli society.

Newspapers in the Arab world continue to print scurrilous stories about Jews, notwithstanding Israel's peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan. Arieh Stav's Peace: The Arabian Caricature (Gefen) illustrates the problem. As he shows, anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli cartoons are a staple of the Arab press.

The roots of anti-Semitism are deep and tangled. In Gentile Tales: The Narrative Assault on Late Medieval Jews (Yale University Press), historian Miri Rubin describes the principal anti-Jewish stories that touched off violence against Jews during this dark era.

In The Lion and the Star (University Press of Kentucky), Jonathan Friedman explores everyday relations between Jews and Germans in three Hessian towns – Frankfurt, Giessen and Geisenheim – from 1919 to 1945. Entrenched anti-Semitism pervaded these communities, and the reaction to Hitler's anti-Jewish policies was characterized by apathy and by an increase in both support for and resistance against genocide.

Wolfgang Benz, a German historian, claims in The Holocaust (Columbia University Press) that while most Germans were not necessarily aware of their government's genocidal policy, they had many opportunities to apprise themselves of it. "Because they were horrified and ashamed of the crimes," he observes, "they did not wish to (share) the responsibility by knowing about them." Quite a commentary.

The Catholic Church and Nazi Germany (HarperCollins), by Guenter Lewy, develops the thesis that the church was an accomplice in Adolf Hitler's twisted dreams. This disturbing book is based on thorough research.

Composers of the Nazi Era (Oxford UnIversity Press), by Michael Kater, studies the careers of eight prominent German musicians.

Did American Jews do all in their power to try to thwart the catastrophe which befell European Jewry in the 1930s and 1940s? David Morrison, in Heroes, Anti-Heroes and the Holocaust (Gefen), examines the question from several perspectives.

In 1944, 1,000 Jewish and Christian refugees were brought to safety to the United States. In Haven (Random House), Ruth Gruber recounts their stories in stirring fashion.

Jewish musicians by the thousands were driven out of Germany and Austria by the Nazis, and their departure impoverished these countries musically and enriched the United States. This, essentially, is the theme of Driven Into Paradise (University of California Press), a collection of illuminating essays edited by Reinhold Brinkmann and Christoph Wolff.

Lawrence Langer, in Pre-empting the Holocaust (Yale University Press), looks at Holocaust themes in literature, memoirs, film and painting. An intellectually bracing book.

Dachau is a pleasant town near a notorious concentration camp in southern Germany. Decades after World War II, Dachau is unable to forget, yet unwilling to be defined by its past. In The Last Survivor (Random House), Timothy Ryback examines Dachau through the eyes of an eccentric Holocaust survivor, Martin Zaidenstadt, who embodies its dual identity.

How should Germany commemorate the Holocaust? James Young, in At Memory's Edge (Yale University Press), delves into this perennial topic by focusing on the yet-to-be-opened Jewish Museum and the planned Holocaust memorial, both in Berlin.

Anselm Kiefer, the noted German artist, explores the legacy of fascism. Lisa Salzman, in Anselm Kiefer and Art After Auschwitz (Cambridge University Press), knowingly analyzes his work and places it in perspective.

The Rothschilds. The Bronfmans. The Sassoons. The Ochses. These are among the some 80 wealthy clans Darryl Lyman profiles in Great Jewish Families (Jonathan David), a useful reference work for all ages.

Who's Who in Canadian Jewry (JESL Educational Products), edited by Edmond Lipsitz, mixes pen portraits of noteworthy men and women with essays on challenges facing Canadian Jewry at the dawn of a new millennium. Unfortunately, the biographies are bizarrely selective. There is an entry for Rosalie Abella, the Ontario Court of Appeal judge, but not for her husband, Irving, a respected historian and community activist.

Nan Fink, co-founder of Tikkun magazine, is a Christian convert to Judaism. Stranger in the Midst (HarperCollins), her uplifting memoir of spiritual discovery, explores the pain and joy of embracing a new religion. It should be read in conjunction with Rabbi Devon Lerner's Celebrating Interfaith Marriages (Fitzhenry & Whiteside). The Half-Jewish Book (Random House), which celebrates Americans of partial Jewish origin, should also be of interest.

Two sides of the coin. In Saying Kaddish (Random House), Anita Diamant ruminates on time-honoured practices and rituals of Jewish mourning. And in Kosher Sex (Doubleday), Rabbi Shmuley Boteach draws on Jewish tradition to illuminate sexual practices.

There is more than one way to be Jewish, and in Generation J (HarperCollins), Lisa Schiffman counts the ways with panache.

Be it literature or history, the Bible is a compelling document. The Pocket Canons (Grove Press), based on the authorized King James version, is a collection of 12 small-format books focusing equally on the Jewish and Christian Bibles. Meanwhile, in Dreams of Being Eaten Alive (Crown), David Rosenberg deftly explores the literary foundations of the Kabbalah.

Jews, as the late Raphael Patai attests, can look back on a long seafaring history. His last book, Children of Noah: Jewish Seafaring In Ancient Times (Princeton University Press), is a robust, revealing work of scholarship. Allan Borovoy, in The New Anti-Liberals (Canadian Scholars' Press), offers an interesting collection of essays about civil rights issues.

Several cookbooks have crossed my desk, and all are recommended. The New Jewish Holiday Cookbook (Random House), by Gloria Kaufer Greene, is formidably comprehensive. Jewish Holiday Treats (Raincoast), by Joan Zoloth, brims with recipes and craft projects. Mother & Daughter Jewish Cooking (HarperCollins), by Evelyn and Judi Rose, is a blend of the traditional and the contemporary. The Jewish Holiday Baker (Random House), by Joan Nathan, draws on her own rich experience and that of 13 international bakers. The 2nd Ave. Deli Cookbook (Random House), by Sharon Lebewohl and Rena Bulkin, delivers peerless renditions of traditional Jewish dishes. Sephardic Flavors (Raincoast), by Joyce Goldstein, is a beautifully-crafted volume.

No Room Of Their Own (Columbia University Press), by Yael Feldman, analyzes recent Israeli fiction by women. Contemporary Jewish Writing in Austria (University of Nebraska Press), edited by Dagmar Lorenz, is a portfolio of fiction and non-fiction.

Take note of two first-rate works published by Oxford University Press: Pocket Fowler's Modern English Usage and The Oxford Dictionary of Quotations. Both are of immeasurable value for writers and students.

Jewish Life

Exploring customs

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Sephardi rite is very rich in its customs. A case in point is the Torah reading. What could be simpler and more straightforward than the weekly reading of the Torah? Seven congregants are called up, first the kohen and then the levi. Right? Well not quite.

In a Sephardi synagogue, as soon as someone is called to the Torah, the first thing you will notice is that not just the one person stands to the honour, but many people do, sometimes many many people. In fact, the entire family of the one honoured – children, grandchildren, nephews, sons-in-law and younger brothers – all rise and remain standing for the duration of the aliyah.

This is also the case when the rabbi is offered an aliyah; only then, the whole congregation stands! Not only is respect being accorded to the individual, but also the honour of the family as a unit and the honour of the Torah are being shown.

You will also hear the chazzan serenade the person going up with song. There are songs for everyone. Most Hebrew names have a song, as do all life-cycle occasions, weddings, bar mitzvahs etc. It is the mark of a fine chazzan that he is able to recall just the right song for the situation. At times a chazzan will even compose a special one just for the moment. If the person going up is doing so because of a celebration, he will further be showered with sweets thrown at him by the women in the balcony – should you be close by, take cover!

There are also rules governing which aliyah one receives. Generally, shlishi – the third – is perceived as the top honour, followed by shishi – the sixth. After the sixth aliyah, additional ones (over and above the seven) may be added. These are called hosafot – additions. The seventh aliyah is called mashlim – conclusion.

From these names arise interesting customs. The father of either a newborn son or a bar mitzvah is always offered an "additional" aliyah. This is like saying: "May God add to you yet another son, bar mitzvah, etc." A bridegrooms, on the other hand, is offered mashlim, as a sign that he has concluded the quest for his spouse – never hosafot, which would imply his need for another wife!

The strong preference for boys is well known. Hence on the birth of a daughter, one is not offered an additional aliyah, which would imply the wish for (gulp) more girls; rather mashlim is offered, as in conclusion – next time a boy, please! (shame)

One observing the end of a year of mourning is also given mashlim – conclusion, as in saying, "May this be the end of your sorrow."

After the reading, the traditional Mi Sheberach blessing will be said for the one who has gone up, as well as for anyone he may request: wife, children, the ill etc. Then the Hashkabah – the Sephardi memorial prayer will be recited, even on Shabbat and yom tov and a pledge of donation made.

At the conclusion of the aliyah, all those who stood, now walk up to the tebah (as the Sephardim call the bimah), to their honoured relative. Small children will kiss his hand, all others his cheeks. All will say "chazak ou baruch" – strength and blessing. He responds "baruch tiye" – blessing to you. As the individual then descends and returns to his seat, all whom he encounters on his way will also kiss him. One kiss is never appropriate, two kisses, one on each cheek, please!

Act of kindness remembered

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

She was one of the lucky ones – a child survivor of Bergen-Belsen concentration camp. After liberation, she was taken to a facility in the forest near Braunschweig, Germany, to recuperate. But she fell ill with typhus.

During the High Holy Days of 1945, some Jewish soldiers from the British army held religious services. "They were looking at me because not many children survived the camps," she recalls.

A soldier befriended her; he spoke some Yiddish. She recalls posing with him for a group photo: a sick, malnourished 11-year-old orphan from the Zamosz region of southeastern Poland, sitting in his lap, embarrassed by her shaved and kerchiefed head.

"He told me he was 22 years old and from Canada, and that he was going home. He said he had a sister who died, and that his parents would be happy to take me into their home as their daughter."

Despite his repeated offer, she went with an aunt to Israel instead. She moved to Canada in 1967, and today she is a wife, mother and grandmother living in north Toronto.

Several years ago she returned to Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen and found records and photos of her murdered grandfather and uncles. But about her Canadian soldier, she is still in the dark. She doesn't recall his name but has never forgotten his kindness. "I'll always remember how nice he was. If he would be still alive, I would like to meet him."

She believes he was one of 168 Canadians who served with British forces during World War II. Today he would be about 77, a veteran of the British army. Members of the Jewish War Veterans Society have been unable to locate him.

If you think you know him, ask him if he remembers the girl. If he says yes, tell him she also hasn't forgotten, and please write to me c/o The CJN.

Lest We Forget: Canadian military records from World War I to the present are available from the National Archives of Canada. However, due to federal privacy legislation, access may be restricted.

According to Bill Wood, head of the personnel records unit, the Archives holds 4 to 5 million military files. A typical file contains 25 to 30 paper pages for a World War I vet, 100 to 200 pages for a World War II vet and up to 1,000 pages for a career service-person. The files contain such information as date and place of birth, address, names of parents and next of kin, medical and dental records, and details of service such as postings, promotions, injuries and medals.

While World War I records are freely available to all researchers, later records are governed by privacy restrictions that may limit their access to immediate family members (parents, spouses, brothers, sisters, children, grandchildren). The signed consent of the veteran, if living, is required; if deceased, proof of death is required.

If the veteran has been deceased for more than 20 years, the entire file is available to any researcher; if less than 20 years, limited information, including most genealogical details, is available to family members, who must furnish proof of death and kinship (a newspaper obituary will usually suffice).

Write to: Personnel Records Unit, National Archives of Canada, Ottawa Ontario, K1A 0N3. Include the service person's full name and, if known, date of birth, service number, and (where applicable) proof of death and your relationship to the service person.

State the purpose of your request (that is, "genealogical") when writing. The Archives charges no fee but may request 20 cents per page for photocopying extensive files. Its Web site is located at www.archives.ca.

Jewish Life

Interesting questions raised

The Modern Jewish Canon, A Journey Through Language and Culture*, by Ruth R. Wisse, The Free Press, $41.50.

Has the time come for a Jewish literary canon? What books cry out for inclusion? What are the most noteworthy, significant and enduring works of Jewish prose fiction in the 20th century?

Books
Bernard Baskin

These are some of the difficult but intriguing questions that Ruth Wisse poses in this ambitious, original and inventive work of literary criticism. Raised in Montreal and now a professor of Yiddish literature and comparative literature at Harvard University, Wisse regards a book as Jewish – fit for her canon – if it respects the autonomy of Jewishness and the centrality of Jewish National experience.

For her, "modern Jewish literature is the repository of modern Jewish experience; it is the most complete way of knowing the inner life of the Jews."

Concerned only with fiction available in English, translated from the Ashkenazi European and Jewish languages (Yiddish and Hebrew) and limited to only one major book by each author, Wisse lists 50 books, ranging from The Mare (1897) by Mendele Moykher Sforim (S. Y. Abramovitch) to Philip Roth's American Pastoral (1997).

Surprising and controversial in her game of musical chairs is the exclusion of Bernard Malamud. She maintains that the protagonists in his novels The Assistant and The Fixer achieve redemption through suffering, a concept that seems more Christian than Jewish.

Shalom Aleichem, understandably, receives close and detailed scrutiny. Tevye the Dairyman, the beguiling account of the troubles of a stubborn hard-working village Jew with wife and daughters, adumbrates many of the problems that would later beset modern Jews.

In 10 chronological chapters, Wisse discusses the works, influence and significance of such writer as Franz Kafka, Isaac Babel, Henry Roth, Isaac Bashevis Singer, S. Y. Agnon, Saul Bellow, Amos Oz, and many others.

Cynthia Ozick is highly praised for placing Jewish themes rather than just Jewish characters at the centre of her work. In addition, her fiction "affirms Jewish trust in life by denying the Holocaust its primacy as the defining event of Jewish experience."

The only Canadian that merits attention is A. M. Klein whose poetic novel The Second Scroll is extolled as "an experiment in jubilation." The American critic Ludwig Lewisohn many years ago hailed Klein as the most Jewish poet who has ever used English, "the only Jew," he wrote, "who has ever contributed a new note of style, of expression, of creative enlargement to the poetry of that tongue".

A Chapter in the Making deals with the contribution of modern Hebrew writers, especially Yaakov Shabtai, whose ground-breaking novel, Past Continuous receives protracted analysis.

Wisse points out that approximately 350 Hebrew novels and 250 books of poetry are published annually in Israel. Israelis support their literary industry by buying almost 11 million books a year. Israel's 200 publishing houses put out more than 4,000 new titles a year, one of the highest per capita outputs in the world.

This rich, authoritative, brilliant work ends with this challenge: "The writers discussed in this book have left as great a record of modern experience as any people could wish for. The rest is up to the readers, individually and through collective study and transmission."

Gefilte fish on the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It may not have the sweet aroma of freshly baked challah. Or the medicinal qualities of a bowl of piping hot chicken soup. But love it or not, gefilte fish has made its mark on Jewish culinary life. Today, gefilte fish on the Web.

In an article in the Santa Rosa Press Democrat, Miriam Silver perfectly summed up the dilemma of gefilte fish, [http://www.pressdemo.com/features/passover/gefilte.html]. Although in Judaism fish is symbolic of fertility and prosperity and has magical qualities in mysticism, "the ground-up, stuffed, over-cooked and cold gefilte fish has taken on a less glamorous sheen. It was a product, perhaps, of the shtetl culture – peasant Jews in the old country who probably used whatever fish was left over, ground it up and boiled it in a stock of old fish heads and bones. It was labour intensive and did not always seem worth it. Fast forward to contemporary U.S.A. with its fast-food convenience culture, and those oval, gray fish balls, mass-manufactured, tanked in a jar, swimming in jelly, along with a few old cooked carrots." But now people are rediscovering those old recipes and inventing new ones. The same page has recipes for both Classic Gefilte Fish and Salmon Gefilte Fish poached in fennel-wine broth with golden horseradish.

(Speaking of reclaiming your heritage, Albertson College of Caldwell, Idaho runs an Introduction to Judaism class. One activity has students cooking up their own gefilte fish [http://www.acofi.edu/comm/news/gefilte.htm].)

But why gefilte fish and why the Jews? In an excellent article in Jewish Heritage online magazine, Claudia Rosen examines the talmudic sources that brought fish to the Sabbath table and the cultural ones that made salt herring popular on the other days of the week [http://www.jhom.com/topics/fish/gefilte.html].

"Gefilte fish evolved as a Sabbath dish because stuffing gives it glamour and because certain versions eliminate the need to remove bones (which could be considered a forbidden activity on the Sabbath)."

One of the mostly heated debates in Jewish cuisine is over how to best prepare gefilte fish: sweet or peppery. According to Michael Steinlauf who teaches Jewish studies at Gratz College in Philadelphia, how you fancy your fish can tell a lot about your heritage [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0899/gefilte.html]. "The 'gefilte fish line' ran though eastern Poland. Jews living to the west – most of Poland, as well as Germany and the rest of Western Europe – ate the sweet gefilte fish. Those to the east – Lithuania, Latvia and Russia – ate the peppery treat."

That "gefilte fish line" is nothing new to Allan Evans. I chanced upon an e-mail he sent to a kosher food message board looking for advice on finding take-out gefilte fish without sugar [http://www.chowhound.com/boards/kosher/messages/43.html]. "Having been raised on the subtle tart Litvak style of preparing this dish, [I find] the sweetening of this delicacy is an abomination to the palate."

Evans would be advised to stay far away from the next Web site. Sweet Style Gefilte Fish calls for ½ pound of ground whitefish, ½ pound of ground pike, 1 pound of ground dore and ⅔ cup sugar [http://www.betterbaking.com/baker2/passovergef.html].

Sweet or peppery, it can be tough trying to live up to a family tradition. In Adventures in Bubby Irma's Kitchen, we get both a recipe and a story: [http://www.ultimateshabbat.org/food/cookbook/appetizers/gefilte_fish.htm]

"Making gefilte fish is a challenge. My mother made it – my grandmother made it – and I had to make it… But, like every child, I needed my parents' approval. At that time we were living in Worcester, Mass., and my parents lived in Camden, N.J.

"I carefully wrapped a jar of the freshly made delicacy and sent it out airmail, special delivery. A few days later, I received a call from Mom and Dad telling me how great the fish was. I was thrilled. Years later they finally told me the truth… it arrived spoiled but they didn't want to hurt my feelings. I made another batch while they were visiting and got their full approval."

Next week, more gefilte fish recipes – and how to give gefilte fish from a jar a heimishe taste.

CHAT students take part in leadership conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Mark Daniels, attending a recent student leadership conference meant a "sense of international chevra."

The 16-year-old was one of three Grade 11 students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) who were chosen to represent the school at the first Jewish Student Leadership Conference of the North American Association of Jewish High Schools (NAAJHS) held in November at the New Jewish High School and at Brandeis University, both in Waltham, MA.

Daniels, Chaim Cutler and Sara Greenwood were picked because they were "identified as student leaders," said Rabbi Eliot Feldman, CHAT liaison to the association, which was formed last year.

CHAT headmaster Paul Shaviv and other day school principals have met to discuss curricular issues and ideas for teacher training, said Rabbi Feldman, who accompanied the students to Boston. "Now they have expanded it to involve the students."

The three CHAT students, all alumni of Associated Hebrew Schools, serve as madrichim (leaders) on Grade 9 Shabbatons.

Cutler is on the school's religious affairs committee, and runs the debate committee. He is also an adviser for Kadimah, a junior high school age Conservative youth group at his synagogue.

Daniels, who two years ago received the highest score possible on a tough international mathematics competition, is on CHAT's athletic council, and is involved in cross-country, track and field and volleyball. He is also a participant in this year's Model UN.

Greenwood is a peer counsellor and a member of the school's cross-country and gymnastics teams.

They were the only Canadian students among the group of 28, representing 13 Jewish high schools in North America.

"I thought we accomplished a lot," said Cutler, who said the event opened his eyes to the existence of Jewish schools where he wouldn't have expected them. "There was no network at all, and we came out with different ways to network the different schools."

Among their ideas was an international tikkun olam project yet to be implemented. The CHAT students were impressed by some of the large-scale community service projects run in the States, as well as by some of their exchange programs with Israeli schools – not to mention the San Diego school that offers surfing and scuba-diving as part of its physical education program.

An NAAJHS Shabbaton and Arts and Athletic Invitational is slated for March, to be hosted by the Jewish Academy of Metropolitan Detroit at a kosher retreat that can house up to 400.

As representatives of the only Canadian school at the initial student conference, the students found the biggest difference between them and their American counterparts – including Orthodox, Conservative and community day schools – was CHAT's large student population (1,500) compared to some of the schools, most of which had between 40 and 200 students.

Cutler also noted that CHAT was the only school that did not have mandatory prayer. Orthodox-style services are held before class hours for those who choose to attend.

At the conference, students could choose to attend Orthodox, Conservative egalitarian, Conservative traditional, Reform or "Ruach" minyanim.

The three representatives are religiously observant, although, as Greenwood noted, "I don't know how much that represents CHAT."

Cutler found it interesting that the American students attending the Conservative egalitarian minyan "really felt they were Conservative egalitarian and knew where they stood."

The packed schedule of the leadership conference, which was also a Shabbaton, left little time to discuss issues such as violence or assimilation, the students said. The focus instead was on the functioning of the network. "Part of [the purpose of] this network is to be able to discuss these issues," said Cutler.

The Canadian students are in touch with the Americans by e-mail and plan to start an NAAJHS committee at CHAT.

"We became friends with everybody," said Greenwood.

Their goal, said Daniels, is to "maintain continuity, to try and strengthen Jewish ties around the world, and to do something to help Judaism."

Marantz remembered fondly at Bloor JCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 20 years or more, Florence Marantz was a familiar figure at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC), a constant part of the building's inner landscape, a reassuring connection to the good old days and all the memories they entailed.

Obituary

Marantz died recently of TPP-Huss, a rare blood disease that affects only 100 Canadians a year. She was 58.

Marantz's untimely death shocked co-workers and JCC members alike. Only two weeks before, she had attended a Centre event and had mingled with friends, enjoying a jazz vocalist's stylings and shmoozing with her sister-in-law. A few days later she was admitted to hospital. She succumbed to the disorder in only 12 days.

"It's hard to imagine working at the JCC without Florence's presence," said Hélène Comay, director of the Centre's nursery school. "Her death was just so shocking and fast. We're still reeling from it. She will be enormously missed."

"Florence was a fixture at the Centre," said Bill Emery, the Bloor JCC's executive-director. "Both staff and members are devastated. People still expect to come around the corner and for her to be standing there. It's going to take a long time for people to get used to her not being there."

Marantz was instrumental in moving the Centre towards its current focus on arts-based programming and she helped arrange a partnership with the Island Yacht Club, which offers sailing instructions to Centre youth.

Marantz is also credited with the success of the Centre's early childhood programming as well as its after-school programs.

Marantz, who lived in the Annex within walking distance of the Centre, was "an extremely compassionate person. I think every bag lady on Bloor Street knew her," Golden said.

Marantz is survived by her brother Jerry and sister-in-law Jody Golden, her children Jonathan and Cara, and her nieces and nephews, Joy Leopold, Judy Golden, Jordan and Beverly Golden, Alanna Golden and Simon Golden.

Domestic violence said common to all ethnic groups

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Women abuse is just one of the many things that Arab and Jewish women have in common, say two directors of women-abuse centres in Israel.

"We don't always agree, but more and more we learn that we can share experiences and learn from each other," said Aida Touma-Suliman, director of Women Against Violence, an Arab Israeli women's association that founded and operates Israel's only two shelters for battered Arab women.

Touma-Suliman; Debbie Gross, director of the Crisis Centre for Religious Women; and Mary Lou Fassel, director of legal services at the Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic, an organization that provides free legal and counselling services to women who are victims of sexual and domestic abuse, spoke at a recent panel sponsored by the New Israel Fund (NIF).

Elaine Todres of Elaine Todres & Associates Inc., formerly president of Baycrest Centre Foundation and among other positions, assistant deputy director of the Ontario Women's Directorate, was moderator of the panel.

Toronto was one stop on an 11-day Women's Voices tour, sponsored by NIF, that took Touma-Suliman and Gross to such cities as New York, Chicago, San Francisco and Washington D.C.

The goal of the tour is to raise consciousness as well as funds to support social change initiatives that improve the lives of women of all backgrounds living in Israel.

Gross, whose crisis centre began in a kitchen in 1983 – the centre has since set up in Shaare Zedek hospital and has helped more than 8,000 women – said that modern Orthodox and haredi women were always reluctant to phone crisis hotlines.

"We had to find a way to reach these women and be careful not to intimidate them; we had to reach out slowly in a way they could hear us.

"Our centre meets the needs of religious women who are unable to turn to existing crisis centres because of the religious issue and are, therefore, not receiving vital help and support. After suffering such pain, they need to talk to someone who understands."

In those communities, she said, many women fear that if someone finds out about why they are calling, it may ruin their chances of getting married.

"[We have learned that] an anonymous hotline meets the needs of the women. They can call and get help without worrying someone will find out. It takes one woman reaching out her hand to another woman."

Before the hotline started up, she said, they asked rabbis for "their blessing, their advice, and their stamp of approval. We wanted to find a way to get to the women without desecrating God."

Among the callers to the hotline, she said, 50 percent were haredi, 30 percent modern Orthodox, 15 percent Conservative and 5 percent secular.

NIF has given her centre grants, said Gross, so they can run educational programs. "We wanted to reach children, teenagers and women without using the word 'sex.' We wanted children to know that if something happens, they have to tell someone else."

Touma-Suliman, whose centre serves the Arab minority in Israel, said that in a traditional Palestinian family, men are the rulers. "Palestinian Arab men have lost control over their land and their destiny. The only control they have is domestic control. They still feel empowered inside the house."

It is difficult, however, to discuss family issues, she said. "It is [hard to call] attention to violence against women because of taboos," said Touma-Suliman.

She started up the centre, she said, after realizing that there were battered women who had nowhere to turn. "We decided we had to make enough noise to let everyone know there is a problem, and we had to provide services for battered women."

Just like religious Jewish women, she said, Palestinian Arab women felt they had no resources. "This drove us to develop our own services. We have to be sensitive to the culture. We don't want women to pay the price because we imposed a solution on them."

Fassel said that despite the similarity of services at the three centres, "we are from different worlds. We work in a resource-rich environment. Provincial funding now stands at $135 million, including a victim witness assistance program."

Violence occurs within all communities in Toronto, she said, and she has tried to reach immigrant women "who are trapped in their society. There are a [number of people] in the immigrant community who perceive the need to remain insular."

Suitcase rekindles memories of lost youth

After the war, Brady had been instrumental in saving documents from a secret weekly magazine published in Theresienstadt by the boys of his barracks. Called Vedem (In the Lead), the stories and observations had been compiled into a book, We Are Children Just the Same, published in 1995. A movie treatment of the book is in the works and Brady had hoped the writer would include a part based on his sister, though he had been reluctant to infringe on the writer's creative freedom by insisting on it.

In February, while attending a symposium in Bethlehem, Pa. on culture and the Holocaust, he was stunned when he viewed the program. It reproduced the list of prisoners in Theresienstadt's "Heim 28," house 28. There, at the top of the list was his sister's name.

"Normally I try to stay away from things like this. Normally, I try to avoid it," he said.

Then in August, the letter arrived from Japan, indicating the museum had acquired his sister's suitcase on loan from the Auschwitz museum. The suitcase was proving to be a popular exhibit but the centre's information about its owner was sparse. A flyer from the resource centre stated that "this suitcase most attracts the attention of the visitors, letting them focus on this one little life lost in the Holocaust, and effectively realized the tragedy of the Holocaust which took the life of 1½ million children."

Hanna Brady

The museum requested Brady provide more details about his sister and their lives together in pre-war Czechoslovakia.

As Brady tells the story now, his family hailed from Nove Mesto, a town in Czechoslovakia. Soon after the war started, the Nazis arrested his parents. In 1942, he and Hanna were imprisoned in Theresienstadt. By that time, their parents had been shipped to Auschwitz and murdered.

Classified as orphans by the Nazi bureaucracy – first they kill your parents, then they call you orphans, he says bitterly – they were placed in separate children's barracks in the camp. From that time on, Brady, who was three years older than Hanna, felt an obligation to try to protect his sister, even though there was little anyone could do to avoid the Nazis' appetite for murder.

George became an apprentice plumber, his sister lived in a barracks with other young girls. At first they had little contact but during the next two years they found the opportunity to see each other regularly.

Despite the fact Theresienstadt is considered a model camp, a sort of Nazi Potemkin village designed to fool visiting Red Cross officials, conditions were harsh. Typhoid and scarlet fever struck down many, and his sister contracted encephalitis, though she pulled through. Their grandmother, an elderly woman requiring full-time care, died due to the terrible conditions, as did many other senior citizens. Many committed suicide rather than live in squalour, Brady said.

The prisoners were often hungry. Brady recalls an incident that still chokes him up. When Hanna "was 11 years old she gave me bread, because she thought I needed it more."

Despite the conditions, cultural life was not extinguished in the camp. In his barracks, the boys published Vedem, but of the 100 youngsters involved in its publication, only 15 survived.

George Brady

In Heim 28, Hanna and the other girls were mentored by Friedl Dicker-Brandeis, an artist of the Bauhaus school. After the war, Hanna's drawings made their way to the Jewish Museum in Prague and were recently put on display in Tokyo. "I didn't even know that she painted," George said, fighting back tears.

George now carries copies of Hanna's drawings as a recollection of their youth. Preserving the memory of his beloved Hanna is still an important part of his life.

With the newfound information about his sister's suitcase, he has managed to convince the movie screenwriter to include her story in her script. George's daughter is intensely interested in her late aunt and feels connected to her.

In January, George plans to meet Fumiko Ishioka, director of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre, who will visit him in Toronto. He's gratified at the attention his sister's life is receiving in Japan. "The only thing I can do for my sister is to see that she's remembered," he says.

U of T will honor pioneer's home

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There is now a vacant lot where the house on 42 St. George St. stood.

All that is left of Mendel Granatstein's home, a property which is now owned by the University of Toronto, is the front portico.

According to Heritage Toronto records, the home was the first in Toronto to be owned by a Jew.

It was demolished in 1999, despite an appeal by Sheldon Godfrey, a former chair of Heritage Canada Foundation, to have the building designated as a historical site under the Ontario Heritage Act.

Granatstein, a co-founder of the Henry Street Shul (now Beth Jacob Synagogue), is to be honoured by the university.

"I'll be there with bells on," said his grandson, Marvin Fremes, former president of the Jewish Vocational Service, now retired.

Granatstein will be honoured with a plaque. The date of the ceremony and the nature of the new building have not yet been set, Fremes said.

"My grandfather built a grand house on St. George Street to be close enough to walk to his shul on Henry Street," said Fremes. "I walked with him on many Saturdays. It was a big house with a permanent sukkah and chauffeur's quarters."

His grandfather came to Toronto before 1880. He was owner of M. Granatstein and Son, processors of rags, which occupied a building on Wellington Street, west of Spadina Avenue.

Granatstein was the first Canadian Jew to sign a labour contract with a union guaranteeing his employees the right to leave work early on Fridays to observe Shabbat. Workers were also not required to make up the time Saturday nights after Shabbat ended, as was required before the contract was signed.

"It worked out well during World War I, but after the war, there was a strike, which the union lost, mostly because of scabs," said Morris Biderman, author of A Life on the Jewish Left, An Immigrant's Experience.

Fremes' mother, Gertrude, was the only daughter in a family of seven children.

One of his grandfather's descendants is Jack Granatstein, former history of professor at University of Toronto.

According to Rabbi Moses Burak, Fremes' grandfather's name is listed on a plaque as honorary treasurer of the Henry Street shul, now ensconced in the foyer of the present Beth Jacob Synagogue at the corner of Wilmington and Overbrook.

"My grandfather fled from Poland just a jump and a half ahead of the Russian army. When he came to Toronto a lot of Jews eked out a precarious living with a horse and wagon, going through the streets, cryng out, 'Rags? Bones.'

"My anti-Semitic schoolmates called people like my grandfather 'sheenies.'"

The building on Henry Street is now the Trinity Christian Orthodox Church.

נרות חנוכה

אם יש עשר סיבות מדוע חיתי רוצה לחזור לילדותי, אחת מהן היא לחוות שוב את קסם חנוכה של ילד בישראל. הנרות, המשפחה, החכנות להצגה בבית הספר, הקסם של הריבה באמצע הסופגנייה שחיום אוכלים אותה כל יום בתור donut, השירים, החושך שבאנו לגרש. לו רק יכולתי לחזור לרגע לכסליו של 1955. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Coast to Coast

Bouchard took the high road

Anti-semitism has reared its ugly head once again, this time in Quebec.

Former MNA and senior Quebec civil servant, Yves Michaud, recently castigated Jews and other minorities for their opposition to Quebec nationalism. The hard-line separatist then went on to brand B'nai Brith members as terrorists and rebuked Jews for presenting themselves as the victims of greater suffering than any other group in history.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Lucien Bouchard's reaction was immediate and unequivocal. Anyone holding those views had no place in the Parti Québécois and as leader of the party, Bouchard would never agree to endorse Michaud as a candidate in the next provincial election.

The Quebec premier could have stopped there, but what he added is nothing short of mind-boggling. In a media scrum following an emergency session of the PQ Executive, Bouchard reiterated his position and then explained that his personal revulsion for Michaud's comments is based upon his belief that, in fact, the Jewish people have indeed suffered more persecution than anyone else through the centuries.

Having taken the high road from the get-go and having warned that the PQ must purge itself of any sign of intolerance towards Jews and other minorities, what could have driven the man adored by many pure laine (pure-blooded) Quebecois Catholics to make so sweeping a declaration?

Contrary to what many cynics have suggested, this was no crude and self-serving attempt to seduce Jews to the nationalist cause. Bouchard well knows that the cumulative experience of Jews over two plus millennia has created an inherent aversion and wariness to expressions of nationalism and that the Jewish community could never be won over to Quebec sovereignty.

Given that, by comparison, Bouchard makes the enigmatic Robert Bourassa appear as transparent as glass, it is somewhat presumptuous to speculate about his thinking. But having seen the premier's performance during his less-than-successful experiment in federal politics, I am emboldened to hazard a guess.

Bouchard used the opportunity to convey a message both to the Jewish community and to Quebec society in general. Whatever course Quebec nationalism takes over the next months and years, Quebec sovereigntists have to recognize what drives Jewish fears of nationalism, validate that perspective and still welcome Jews as full and legitimate partners in Quebec's future.

Whatever pain the Michaud fiasco may have brought to Quebec's Jews, Bouchard's message makes it worthwhile – movingly so – and it merits commensurate acknowledgement.

Jewish students' centre opens in Waterloo

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As of this month, Jewish students at Wilfrid Laurier University (WLU) and the University of Waterloo (UW) have a home.

The Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Students' Centre of Waterloo can accommodate three students in furnished rental rooms, and will be used for educational, social and cultural programming for the Jewish Students' Association (JSA) of UW and WLU, as well as for the Jewish communities of Kitchener and Waterloo.

Until recently, whenever a JSA activity was scheduled, organizers were "scrounging like crazy for a place," said Paul Socken, chair of Waterloo's department of French studies and unofficial liaison between the university and the JSA, as well as the original chair of the dean's advisory committee on Jewish studies.

Socken sees the Latner house as a complement to the Jewish studies program, which was inaugurated earlier this year. He believes it will help Jewish students maintain their Jewish identity away from home, he said.

The house, located in a residential area on Albert Street, is within walking distance of both universities, about one minute from Laurier and 10 minutes from Waterloo.

It is over 60 years old and was in "immaculate condition," said Socken. The "good-sized" house was purchased by the Latner Foundation and finished – and furnished – by the Kitchener-Waterloo Jewish community of 400 families.

Community members will also be donating time to manage the property, said local businessman Howie Budd, a past president of Kitchener's Beth Jacob Congregation and current co-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's small communities division.

The response from local Jewish community members was "overwhelming," Budd said. He feels the house will give out-of-town parents of Jewish students more peace of mind, and noted also that acquiring the house will also help Kitchener-Waterloo teens connect to the university.

A kitchen was installed upstairs for residents (the main-floor kosher kitchen will be used for JSA events), and upgrades were made to meet current fire code and electrical safety standards, Socken noted.

He estimates the main-floor combination living room/dining room can hold about 70 people for lectures or programs. "There is a beautiful backyard and deck for bagel brunches, Shabbatons, speakers, basically all the things a Jewish student centre will be used for."

Further advantages include the ease of serving hot food for Shabbat dinners (without running to use the ovens of local residents) and being able to erect a Sukkah, said Rosanne Brown, director of unfederated campus organizations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

She expects the quantity of programming will also increase because small to mid-size meetings can now be planned without the need to find and book a room on campus.

"A place to call our own. It's so exciting," she said.

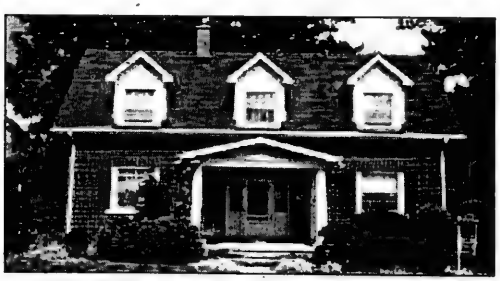
Because many of the students at both universities are in co-op programs, JSA is active over the summer. "We can have barbecues," Brown said. "We did have them before, but we had to get a park permit."

When Socken first joined Waterloo 28 years ago, there were "very few" Jewish students at what is now the fourth-largest university in Ontario. Today the JSA has a mailing list of 500.

"The house will enable us to turn what was formerly a student club into a student community," said Sara Weisman, a music therapy student at Laurier and candidate for JSA president for the coming term. "We really needed this."

Socken hopes the existence of the house will draw more students out. "I think parents can feel good about sending their students to Waterloo, because they'll be able to make the Jewish connection they would want for them."

An official launch will be held in the spring.



The Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Students' Centre of Waterloo, above, opens this month.

PUBLIC NOTICE
SIDEWALK SNOW CLEARING

Residents are required to ensure that snow and ice are cleared from the City sidewalk abutting their property within 24 hours after a fall of snow per by-law #300-93. Notwithstanding this, the Council of the City of Vaughan has approved a City-wide sidewalk snow clearing program to assist residents during periods of heavy snowfall. However, this new service does not alleviate residents from maintaining the sidewalk in a safe condition as required under by-law #300-93.

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are also hereby notified that by-law #358-86 prohibits the building, placement or maintaining of posts, fences, trees, hedges, retaining wall and wooden or cement curbing on all public road allowance on any roadway in the municipality. This prohibition includes the area between the curb and the sidewalk, as well as the area immediately behind the sidewalk. Any such illegally placed objects that are damaged due to winter road or sidewalk maintenance activities will not be replaced/repaired by the City.

Further information may be obtained by contacting the Public Works Department - Roads Division at (905) 832-8562.

DEPOSITING SNOW ON ROADWAY

Owners and tenants of property in the City of Vaughan are hereby notified that Ontario Highway Traffic Act, Section 181 prohibits the placing of snow or ice on a roadway. Please ensure that any snow removed from your property is not placed on the roadway.

VEHICLE PARKING DURING WINTER SNOW CLEARING OPERATIONS

To allow for a more efficient flow of traffic during winfer storm conditions, the City of Vaughan will be actively enforcing its "No Parking" restrictions as permitted under by-law #1-96, Section 4, subsection (7) of the By-law states: "No person shall park a vehicle on a highway so as to interfere with the clearing of snow." In addition, the by-law also prohibits overnight parking of vehicles on any street between the hours of 2:00 am and 6:00 am. It is also an offence to park any part of a vehicle over the sidewalk. This is for pedestrian safety and to help facilitate sidewalk snow clearing operations. Owners are hereby advised that any vehicle found in violation of this by-law shall be tagged and/or towed away. For complete information on parking restrictions within the City of Vaughan, please contact the By-law Enforcement Division at (905) 832-8505.

Program launched to combat abuse of older women

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, Circle of Care, in partnership with the Family Service Association of Toronto, is planning a women abuse program aimed specifically at older women.

The program, for women 55 and over, is for those who are experiencing abuse or have experienced abuse in the past.

Alysa Golden, co-ordinator of the older women abuse program at Circle of Care and a co-facilitator of an eight-session group which begins in early February, said that too often, older women who are experiencing abuse fall through the cracks in the system. Most abuse programs tend to cater to younger women, she says.

Jewish Family & Child Services has offered an abuse program at Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living for women over 55, but this program will ensure that help is ongoing, says Golden.

Joyce Fleiser, director of social work and volunteer services at Circle of Care, said a grant funded by United Way will allow them to develop educational and outreach programs and provide individual and group counselling for the community.

"A large part [of our mandate] is to make people aware of older women abuse, and together with JF&CS, act as a resource.

"People who work with the elderly need to begin identifying women abuse. Women come to health-care professionals with a variety of complaints, and these professionals need to know how to look for underlying issues."

Physical abuse is not difficult to detect, says Golden, but verbal, psychological, emotional or sexual abuse is harder to identify. "Sometimes something the patient says just twigs."

Circle of Care plans to reach out to agencies that work with seniors, community care access centres, as well as rabbis, physicians or "anyone who may have contact with older women."

Golden says that because older women have been in abusive situations longer, the cumulative nature of the abuse makes the effects greater.

"While younger women may be looking to leave an abusive relationship, older women who might now be caring for the abuser may choose to stay.

"Older women also have different health related issues of their own, and some have older children who are estranged because of the abuse."

Abuse is all about power and control, Golden says.

"Abusers' power is buttressed by their physical strength. They feel entitled to abuse someone who is weaker. Elderly men may have a little less strength [than they had when they were younger], but that does not mean that their power over the woman has diminished."

Older women who have been abused often feel ashamed or guilty, and have very low self esteem, she says. "These are things that can be healed, and the women can spend the rest of their lives feeling good about themselves. We can empower them, and let them gain back their self esteem.

"We need to reach out to women who never had the opportunity to heal or grieve in context with the abuse. They are still living with the effects of it," Golden says.

If the woman is still in the relationship, she can learn to focus on herself, says Golden. "We will support her in whatever decision she makes."

Women who have been widowed after an abusive relationship usually find that the grief process is complicated by the fact that they have been abused, she says. "We can help the woman grieve."

People have to be aware that abuse occurs in all age groups, says Golden. "It should not be hidden, and women should not be afraid to come forward. Someone who is really afraid needs to know that she is coming to a safe place, and that she would not be putting herself at risk."

For information on the older women abuse program, call Circle of Care at 635-2860.

JF&CS chosen to head joint mother and child abuse program

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service has been appointed the head agency in a joint program aimed at working with mothers and children who are exposed to domestic abuse.

The agency was chosen by the Ministry of Community and Social Services to be accountable for, and to get MAKETT (Moms and Kids Exposed to Trauma), off the ground.

Other social service agencies in the partnership – which covers the north quadrant of Metro Toronto – include Catholic Family Services, COSTI, Flemingdon Neighbourhood Service, Jamaican Canadian Association and North York Women's Shelter. All these agencies have been providing services in the area of women abuse.

Debby Feldman, supervisor of the women's abuse program at JF&CS said one reason JF&CS was chosen is because of the initiative it took in 1996 in creating its Children Exposed to Abuse program, for children who live in families where abuse has occurred or is occurring.

MAKETT, an early intervention program directed at breaking the cycle of violence, helps mothers and children heal from the impact of violence and learn new strategies and ways of handling conflict, says Feldman.

"We want to prevent children from modelling the behaviour they have witnessed, and help mothers develop a heightened self esteem and self confidence in order to be more effective parents, she says.

Boys who grow up in a violent environment often turn aggressive, while girls often become anxious, Feldman says.

"These are coping strategies; it is the impact of growing up in a home [where abuse occurs]. If we don't get in there and offer healthy ways of coping, kids become more and more distant."

The program is similar to the agency's Children Exposed to Abuse program, Feldman says, but that group was more localized.

"Previously, we could only accommodate small numbers of people. This program is available to any mother or child of any religion, culture or ethnic group, and it will be run at five locations – three groups for children and two groups for moms."

All the agencies service a specific community of women, says Feldman, and the challenge in co-ordinating the program is to attempt to meet the needs of the diversity of women that live within the area.

"We are confident, however, that a program such as this can have a positive result in lessening the negative impact of women abuse."

This session runs from Jan. 15 to April 2 and will be held at Catholic Family Services; the next session will be held at JF&CS. For information call Janice Shaw, the co-ordinator at JF&CS, 416-638-7800.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. Someone told me that skim milk actually has more calcium than whole milk. Is this a fact?

A. It sure is. The lower the fat content in the milk, the more calcium there is – talk about a "two for one!" Eight ounces of skim milk has about 300 mg of calcium, compared to 8 oz. of whole milk, which contains about 250 mg of calcium. Bottoms up!

Q. I am pregnant and trying to take maternity vitamins; however, I find that they are making me extremely nauseous. Why is this? What should I do?

A. You should definitely discuss this with your doctor at your next prenatal visit, but I can give you some suggestions. It is usually the iron in maternity vitamins that can make us feel nauseous.

Here are some tips to help you better tolerate the vitamins. Try taking them on a full stomach or with some food, preferably toward the end of the day. You can alternate days or try breaking the vitamin in half and take half every day.

If you are in the first time trimester of your pregnancy, make sure that you continue taking 1 mg of folic acid every day if you are not taking the maternity vitamins. The folic acid will not cause nausea.

Lastly, try to have as healthy a diet as possible. You can get almost all the necessary nutrients from food.

Lisa Weinberg is a registered dietitian/nutritionist, specializing in pediatric and adult nutrition in Toronto. If you have any nutrition questions, send them to The CJN.

Bombings threaten to undermine peace plan

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A fresh wave of attacks against Israelis has compounded the uncertainty as to whether President Bill Clinton can forge a last-minute Israeli-Palestinian peace deal in the weeks before he leaves office.

In the Gaza Strip last Thursday, two Israelis were killed and two injured in an explosion near the border with Israel. The explosion occurred near the Sufa Crossing in southern Gaza.

Police sources told Associated Press that the explosion occurred when Israeli soldiers were attempting to dismantle a roadside bomb.

Hours earlier, at least 13 people were injured, two of them seriously, when two pipe bombs exploded on a commuter bus in Tel Aviv during lunch-time traffic on a busy thoroughfare.

Police said more serious casualties were averted due to a malfunction in one of the devices, which they said were set off by remote control.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak described the attack as "deplorable" and vowed to "reach the perpetrators and those who dispatched them."

Hours later, Barak renewed a closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Last Thursday's attack came just days after Israel relaxed a previous closure and began letting Palestinian workers return to jobs in Israel. In another incident on the same day, an Israeli was moderately wounded when shots were fired at his car near the West Bank settlement of Alon Moreh.

In Washington, Clinton condemned the violence, saying it "reminds people of what the alternative to peace is."

Clinton, who earlier this week presented Israeli and Palestinian negotiators with the broad outlines of a peace accord, said the attack in Tel Aviv was "the best argument for going ahead and finishing" the peace process.

Clinton said his proposals were based on what he had heard from the two sides during his term in office.

"If there is a peace agreement here, I'm convinced it's within the four corners I've laid out," he said.

Islamic fundamentalist groups had threatened earlier last week to step up terrorist attacks amid intensified efforts by Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA) to reach a peace agreement. Arafat released scores of terrorists from jail shortly after the Palestinians began their violent uprising against Israel three months ago.

Last week's attacks came amid diplomatic uncertainty over the future of Clinton's proposals.

Last Thursday, Israel approved the ideas, on condition that the Palestinians also accept them as the basis for an agreement.

While refraining from formally rejecting the ideas, the Palestinians raised a series of reservations that they said must be clarified before they make a final decision.

As a result, Barak cancelled a planned summit with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat in Egypt.

Nevertheless, Arafat travelled to Egypt to confer with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak. Arafat later said an Arab summit would convene this week to review the U.S. proposals.

Clinton's proposals call for far-reaching concessions by both Israel and the Palestinians.

Most controversial for Israelis is a proposal to cede control of Jerusalem's Temple Mount, the holiest site in Judaism, to the Palestinians.

Under the proposals, Israel would also divide Jerusalem into a patchwork of neighbourhoods, with Arab neighbourhoods coming under Palestinian rule.

In exchange, the Palestinians would scale back their demand that descendants of the Arab refugees who fled or were expelled in Israel's 1948 War of Independence – some four million people in all – be allowed to return to their former homes inside Israel. Even the most dovish Israelis consider this demand a veiled call to eliminate the Jewish state.

Barak has been harshly criticized for conducting negotiations under the deadline of Israel's Feb. 6 elections. The Likud party has likened Barak's efforts to a "clearance sale" of vital Israeli assets, and said it will not be bound by any agreement if it wins the election.

Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert relocated his office from downtown Jerusalem to a building next to the Western Wall in the Old City last Thursday, despite Palestinian threats to react with violence.

Olmert said the move, to last a week, was meant to underscore the possibility that Jews could again lose the Western Wall. Between 1948 and 1967, when the Old City was under Arab control, Jews were denied access to the Western Wall, despite agreements on free passage to holy sites.

The Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for last Thursday's double-bombing on the Gaza Strip border fence, Israel Radio reported. Israeli explosives experts had spotted one of the bombs on the border fence and had called in reinforcements when it went off, followed by the second blast.

Initial reports said that Hamas had claimed responsibility for the bus bombing in Tel Aviv, but a group calling itself the Saladin Brigades later said it was responsible.

In the attack, two pipe bombs exploded on the back of a Dan bus No. 51, travelling from downtown Tel Aviv to the suburb of Petach Tikva. Four of the 13 wounded were Israeli soldiers, including one woman who was put on life support and described as being in serious to moderate condition.

Israeli police cordoned off the area and specialists defused explosives that had not gone off. Police are still investigating how bombs were planted aboard the bus.

Sharon says he won't honour a Barak deal

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Surrounded by the same people who wanted to replace him with Benjamin Netanyahu only a week ago and backed by a giant sign saying "only Sharon will bring peace," Likud chair Ariel Sharon recently unveiled his campaign team for the prime ministerial election.

Sharon promised the assembled Likudniks he would bring unity at home and peace abroad as prime minister. He revealed no plans for achieving these goals, however, but said his diplomatic-security campaign platform would be announced later in the campaign.

One plank of this platform was determined earlier at a meeting with the heads of other opposition parties – a Sharon-led government would not honour any diplomatic agreement signed by Prime Minister Ehud Barak before the elections, even at the risk of international furor.

"Prime Minister Barak has no moral or practical right to conclude fateful diplomatic policies... now that he has resigned as prime minister and has no Knesset majority," the opposition leaders said in a statement afterward.

"We are determined to preserve our eternal capital and the holy places of Israel, even at the cost of the possible complications now brewing in Barak's kitchen."

Sharon did not repeat the recent pledge he made to the Likud central committee – that, if elected, he would form a unity government with Labour in which Barak would be defence minister. This statement had drawn loud boos from the committee. Instead, Sharon merely said he would set up a "broad coalition." This would, however, be difficult to do without Labour support.

Sharon also declined to criticize Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert for his vicious attack on Barak on Sunday, in response to reports that Barak had agreed to give the Temple Mount to the Palestinians.

Sharon did, however, transmit a message to Netanyahu, who has said repeatedly he will run for prime minister when new Knesset elections are held.

"A government I head will serve its full term, until November 2003," Sharon said, but he also called on Netanyahu to help his campaign.

Canada model for rights: Canada's chief justice

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada is a model when it comes to balancing individual rights with group rights, the head of Canada's Supreme Court told an international legal conference in Jerusalem recently.

Sometimes, the rights of a group and those of an individual clash, but those can be worked out through compromises and political accommodations, Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin told the Conference of the Institute of Advanced Legal Studies.

Southam News reported that McLachlin's speech was vetted by the Foreign Affairs department and Canada's ambassador to Israel because of its subject, which was viewed as sensitive in the volatile Middle East.

Her trip was almost cancelled because of the violent clashes between Israeli troops and Palestinians, Southam added.

In her talk, McLachlin held Canada as an exemplar for its protection of linguistic, racial and religious minority rights.

She never mentioned the Middle East, but her talk was widely seen as a suggestion that countries with racial and religious tensions could follow Canada's example.

The implication was that Arabs and Jews can attain a measure of judicial peace in the same way Canada has dealt with Aboriginal and francophone minorities.

"Canada, like most nations, affirms individual rights... but unlike many countries, Canada also recognizes group rights," McLachlin stated. "Group rights are the cornerstone upon which Canada was built. We have been forced to recognize group rights as a means of coping with the diverse groups that make up the Canadian polity.

"We are a stable, peaceful, prosperous country because we have learned to accept and accommodate our conflicts and differences" through the process and pursuit of individual and group rights, she added.

Canada, she noted, has always recognized group Aboriginal rights, culminating in the 1998 Nisga'a Treaty, which confirmed some 2,000 square kilometres in British Columbia as Nisga'a land.

But Canada has also had to confront conflicts between group and individual rights, one being the clash between freedom of expression and collective language rights in Quebec.

Another, McLachlin noted, was the case of parents of children in private religious schools who took the Ontario government to task for failing to support independent schools while it funded Catholic schools.

The case, known as Adler versus Ontario, after the Toronto Jewish parent who was one of the applicants, failed in the Supreme Court because of "the peculiar history of group rights in Canada." The court ruled that funding Catholic schools but not other schools does not violate the Charter of Rights.

A society that embraces both group and individual rights "may expect tensions." But Canada has survived for 130 years "by working out these conflicts in a peaceful way, using the law as the chief instrument.," McLachlin said. The reconciliation of the two kinds of rights is often difficult, "but Canadians have no other choice but to pursue it."

Freedom of religion, she stated, is an individual right. "But if the religion in question is a minority one, its full exercise may be impossible without protection for group worship and schooling." Individual rights can be fully enjoyed only through the recognition of group rights, she explained.

Group rights "permit us to work out our differences in peaceful ways and thus to build a country together in harmony."

When people of various backgrounds, cultures and languages have a common country, "group rights, in tandem with individual rights, provide a vehicle for peacefully working out conflicting claims, while enhancing the dignity and self-fulfillment of all."

Mutual respect is key, McLachlin pointed out.

"I can ask other people to respect my rights only insofar as I am prepared to respect theirs," which becomes harder where group rights are concerned.

"To recognize the language or religion or claim to land or power of people who are not one's own group is always harder than to recognize these rights in one's own group. The Canadian experience thus far suggests that while this process of mutual recognition is difficult, it can succeed."

She added: "We must respect each other to survive."

Ultimately, it is up to judges to maintain legitimacy in the face of criticism and confusion. "Our task is not easy," McLachlin stated. "But for countries like Canada and, dare I say Israel, it is vital."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

CJC trying to help Russian businessman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has intervened in a case turning on the harassment of a prominent Jewish businessman by the Russian government.

Moshe Ronen, national president of CJC, said last week that the issue, which revolves around media mogul Vladimir Gusinsky, is of concern to Canada's Jewish community.

Last month, Ronen raised the matter with the Canadian government, discussing it with Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and writing a letter of protest to Minister of Foreign Affairs John Manley.

On Dec. 18, Ronen discussed the case with Russian President Vladimir Putin during his whirlwind visit to Canada.

Gusinsky, 48, head of Russia's Jewish Congress and vice-president of the World Jewish Congress, was detained by Spanish police some two months ago following an international arrest warrant issued by Interpol at the demand of the Russian authorities.

A vocal critic of Putin and of Russia's war in Chechnya, he was arrested in Russia last June on suspicion of embezzling state funds. Gusinsky, who visited Toronto last March under CJC's auspices, left Russia last summer after agreeing to relinquish control of his Media-Most publishing and broadcasting empire to Gazprom, a Russian natural gas monopoly under the control of the Russian government.

After his departure, Russian prosecutors charged him with fraud and issued a warrant for his arrest.

Critics claim that the accusation is politically motivated and designed to squelch dissent in Russia. Prior to his incarceration, masked Russian police raided his company offices in Moscow.

Gusinsky was released from a Spanish prison in December after posting $5.5 million in bail. He remains in Spain, under house arrest, fighting Russia's extradition request.

Less than two weeks ago, after a court in Moscow dismissed fraud charges against Gusinsky, his Russian lawyer declared: "The court has recognized that Gusinsky is being investigated under a fabricated case."

In an interview, Ronen said that charges against Gusinsky should be dropped if they prove to be politically inspired, and clarified if they are based purely on legal considerations.

Asked whether anti-Semitism is at the root of Russia's campaign against Gusinsky, Ronen replied, "I'm not sure."

Ronen's impromptu meeting with Putin was arranged by Chrétien during a reception in Putin's honour at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa.

"It was a very brief exchange," said Ronen. "Putin said it was a legal matter for the courts. I was satisfied I was able to raise the issue."

Putin, he added, invited him to visit Russia, the sooner the better. "I am considering a trip in March," said Ronen, who hopes to see Putin at the Kremlin.

Ronen said he believes that Chrétien brought up the Gusinsky affair with Putin in a conversation about freedom of the press in Russia.

During the Ottawa reception, Ronen sought out the help of Immigration Minister Elinor Kaplan and Defence Minister Art Eggleton.

"Kaplan was very supportive and promised to raise the issue with the Department of Foreign Affairs," said Ronen. "Eggleton offered to be helpful in any way."

According to Ronen, the World Jewish Congress and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations have rallied to Gusinsky's assistance.

Recently, Avraham Burg, speaker of Israel's Knesset, protested Gusinsky's arrest.

In his letter to Manley, Ronen wrote: "The arrest appears to be part of a high stakes political game... where the prize is control of the media and, particularly, of television networks that have been critical of President Putin. We are deeply concerned that [Russia] has targeted... Gusinsky... for his opposition to the government."

In a letter to Spain's ambassador to Canada, Ronen urged Spain "to take the necessary steps to stop your country from becoming further involved in this injusitice."

Ronen also dispatched a letter to Russia's envoy in Ottawa.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel, Palestinians teeter on edge of peace or war

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel and the Palestinian Authority teeter precariously on the knife edge of peace or war.

Last week, as the second Palestinian uprising continued to simmer after three months of bloody eruptions, the United States submitted a comprehensive blueprint for a final settlement. Israel conditionally accepted it. The Palestinians effectively rejected it.

Israel described the plan, the culmination of years of tinkering, as "a basis for discussion." The Palestinians, in the words of one of their senior spokesmen, dismissed it as a "trap" rather than an "opportunity."

With both sides seeking major clarifications, the much-anticipated meeting between Ehud Barak and Yasser Arafat scheduled for the Egyptian resort of Sharm el Sheik was cancelled, and with it, for now, the possibility of a full-blown summit in Washington that could have set the stage for a historic peace agreement officially ending Israel's bitter conflict with the Palestinians.

If the proposals wither on the vine, the consequences will be serious. Israel will face the bleak prospect of an upsurge of violence. Last week, two Israeli soldiers were killed and 14 Israeli civilians were injured in two separate bombings in the Gaza Strip and in Tel Aviv.

The breakdown of negotiations will have other implications. It will doom Barak's quest for regaining power in the Feb. 6 special election, a referendum about the contours of peace, and will correspondingly enhance Ariel Sharon's chances of becoming the next prime minister.

Bill Clinton, the outgoing president, placed the sweeping proposals on the table in an 11th hour attempt to revive a peace process badly battered by the intifadah. The unrest has claimed almost 350 lives, mostly Palestinians, and shattered the Palestinians' economy and Israel's tourist industry. By all accounts, Clinton's suggestions go beyond those he submitted at last summer's Camp David summit.

Clinton offers sweeping proposals

Predictably enough, Clinton's proposals encountered heavy resistance in both Israel and the autonomous Palestinian areas, since they require painful concessions from each party.

Israel would relinquish the whole of the Gaza Strip and about 95 percent of the West Bank so that the Palestinians could establish a state. In exchange, Israel would give the Palestinians a swath of uninhabited land in the Negev to broaden Gaza. The new border would be patrolled by an international force. Eighty percent of the Jewish settlers in the territories would live under Israeli sovereignty.

Israel and the Palestinians would share the Temple Mount and Jerusalem's Old City. Jewish neighbourhoods in East Jerusalem built since 1967, as well as the Western Wall, would be annexed by Israel.

The Palestinian refugee problem, doubtless the main sticking point, would be resolved through compensation, rehabilitation and resettlement. Israel would accept a token number of refugees, perhaps in the range of 100,000, in a limited family reunification program.

By embracing the proposals, reportedly supported by Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia under U.S. pressure, Barak was forced to backtrack on at least three points.

• After the collapse of the Camp David summit in July, he announced that his concessions were null and void. In fact, they form the core of Clinton's latest proposals.

• Barak, after the outbreak of the uprising, said he would refuse to negotiate under fire, and warned the Palestinians that violence would not pay. In fact, the reverse has been true. The intifadah rages on, albeit on a lower level of intensity, and Barak has sweetened his offer to the Palestinians.

• In the wake of the uprising, Barak declared that Arafat was no longer a partner in peace. Barak now realizes that there is no viable alternative to Arafat.

Israel and the Palestinians have clearly reached a crossroads. They can either settle their differences through diplomacy or war. These are the stark alternatives.

The moment of truth is here.

David vs. Goliath

The Ottawa Citizen recently carried an amazingly perverse Associated Press story from Cairo under the title, "Egypt bans story of David, Goliath: Biblical tale deemed too pro-Israeli" (Dec. 13).

The AP account begins: "David slew Goliath, and then the Egyptian censor slew David."

AP continues: "Three thousand years after the biblical battle between the daring young shepherd and the armour-clad giant, the government censor has ruled that the Old Testament story, also found in Islam's holy Koran – shows Israel in too positive a light."

Now what is so perverse about this decision by the Egyptian government is that the Arab nations and their supporters abroad have long used the story of David and Goliath to great advantage by insisting on its inversion: Jewish [Israeli] David has become Goliath; the Arabs, in the main, hostile to the Jewish state, have become David. This reverse image is especially conveyed in nightly TV news pictures showing armed Israeli soldiers confronting Palestinian youth with slingshots in hand.

Ironically, at the same time that Egypt banned the David and Goliath story, the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee took out a full-page ad in the New York Times (Dec. 15) under the bold heading: "Today's David and Goliath," adopting entirely that very image!

The Globe and Mail's John Stackhouse, in "More people than ever living free, survey shows" (Dec. 21), summarized the important annual report on worldwide democratic trends published by Freedom House. While the trend across much of the globe is towards freedom and democracy (145 countries are listed as free or partly free, "up from 115 a decade ago"), Stackhouse concludes that "Prospects for freedom appeared worst in the Middle East, where Israel was the only one of 14 countries ranked as free."

Recapping the best in Jewish videos from the year 2000

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

This past year was very productive and exciting for Jewish films and videos. The videos arrived in Canada mainly from the United States, France and Israel, and as a result, we had the opportunity to see the best the world has to offer.

The year began with the January video release by Mongrel Entertainment of Man Is A Woman, a hilarious French comedy about a gay Jewish clarinet player who is offered a large sum of money if he marries a woman and has a child. The film is full of great music and some terrific comedic scenes and is a joy to watch.

Later on saw the release of Robin Williams' version of Jakob The Liar. Although the film bombed at the box office and was vilified by the critics, I actually liked it and thought Williams created a warm, touching portrayal.

About the same time, came the low-priced release of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat. I'm not certain how Jewish this video is, but it is a delightfully entertaining production that was staged specifically for this video, and features the long-time star of the show, Donny Osmond.

Early spring saw the video release of Train of Life, a very funny fable about one town's solution to the imminent arrival of German occupation troops. Instead of sitting around waiting for the Nazis, the town buys a train and deports all of its Jewish inhabitants to Russia. This was one of the best Holocaust films to come out in some time.

Tuesdays With Morrie is a very touching film about the last few weeks in the life of a Jewish university professor. When one of Morrie's former students learns about his mentor's condition, he visits Morrie on a regular basis and learns a great deal about life and about dying. Jack Lemmon and Hank Azaria give moving performances in this beautiful little film that was produced for television by Oprah Winfrey.

Mr. Death: The Rise and Fall of Fred A. Leuchter Jr. is a documentary about one of the strangest characters in the world of neo-Nazis.

Leuchter was a "specialist" in executions who was paid to testify at the Ernst Zundel trial in Toronto in the '80s. The only thing Leuchter succeeded in doing was showing the ridiculousness of his opinions and embarrassing himself and all around him. Still, it is a fascinating film.

Miracle At Midnight tells the inspirational story of how the Danish nation saved its Jewish citizens from deportation by the Nazis.

Liberty Heights is Barry Levinson's latest film about growing up Jewish in Baltimore in the 1950s and it arrived on video in the early summer.

A short time later, The Angel Levine was released on video for the first time. This classic film starring Zero Mostel and Harry Belafonte is available at a low sell-through price and can be purchased at many of the better video stores throughout the country.

In late August came the film Deterrence, about the first Jewish president of the United States, starring Kevin Pollak and Timothy Hutton.

In the fall, Keeping The Faith was released on video. This comedy tells the story about a rabbi, a priest and a childhood girlfriend. In some ways this film was more profound than most people thought. It was one of the few Hollywood films in which someone announces their willingness to convert in order to marry a Jewish character.

Also in the fall, we saw the video release of Judy Berlin, Nuremberg and Kadosh, three very different films, but each with its own outlook and point of view.

I should also mention that there were a number of videos released only in the United States. These videos are not available in Canada, but Canadians can purchase them through www.facets.org or www.amazon.com.

These include titles such as Autumn Sun, the Argentine comedy about a single Jewish woman that played at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last May, and the Israeli films Circus Palestina, There Was No War In '72, Jewish Vendetta, A Time For Cherries and Flying Camel.

The Israeli videos were released by SISU Home Entertainment in New York, but SISU did not provide me with screening copies, so I cannot comment on the quality of these films.

Finally, Mongrel Entertainment in Canada recently reduced the prices on such videos as Under The Domim Tree, Summer of Aviya, A Summer in La Goulette, Passover Fever and A Tickle In The Heart. You can contact your video store or Mongrel Entertainment if you are interested in purchasing these titles.

Looking ahead to 2001, more interesting videos appear ready for release. Keep watching these pages for specific news as to titles and release dates.

Actor stars in a play within a play

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Usually it is the parents who want their sons to avoid the theatre because acting is a good way to starve.

But in Andrew Pifko's case, it was just the opposite – his parents Esther and Paul Pifko wanted Andrew to go into the theatre, but he entered University of Toronto instead and graduated four years later with a science degree.

Andrew Pifko

But at age 30, after a year as a banana tree worker at a kibbutz in Israel and another year teaching English in a mountainous region of Japan, Pifko is a professional actor, making a good living through TV voice-overs, in addition to his theatre work.

A graduate of the Claude Watson School for the Arts, he has a starring role in Our Country's Good, a play based on a true story, running at the Tarragon Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave., Jan. 11 to 28. For information, call 416-531-1827.

Pifko has a dual role as a high ranking officer on the English penal ship bringing prisoners to Australia in 1789 and as John Arscott, one of the prisoners. In the play, Arscott decides, despite being whipped soundly, to put on a play, The Recruiting Officer, a high comedy, to prove that the prisoners can redeem themselves and find salvation.

"There is an upbeat ending, with the prisoners making astute comments about recidivism, and all in all, the play shows a bit of hope," Pifko said. One of the women prisoners, though she has been sentenced to hang, throws herself heart and soul into the production, he added.

After working as a snowplough operator, a bartender, a truck driver and a ski instructor to make ends meet while he cut his teeth in theatre, Pifko is excited about this role, where he is in a cast of 10, most of them Stratford Festival veterans.

Three were also with him in Cloud Nine, an Equity Showcase presentation last summer, a drama written by post-modern feminist Caryl Churchill. Pifko was a slave who double-crossed his masters in a colonial African nation, and 100 years later, a male prostitute with no conscience. In both difficult roles, the Toronto actor was riveting.

As a19-year-old in Israel, he worked at the Matzuva kibbutz, a few kilometres south of the Lebanon border, rising at 5 a.m. every morning. He also taught English and drama to kindergarten children.

"The kids were fantastic. They knew Hebrew, English and French, and were wonderful to teach," he said.

After completing university, he joined 4,500 others, in operation JET, as a teacher of English in Japan. "We were in a rural region of Japan, just south of Osaka, in 1995, and I was teaching kids so young they didn't even know Japanese for the days of the week. I was the only white person in that whole region, and for awhile the kids found me a novelty. But that soon wore off. I had to be very creative; I taught English using TV commercials as examples. Some of the time I was teaching Japanese children in grades 6, 7 and 8, and they took to English fine.

"My apartment overlooked a rice field, and every morning I found my window covered with frogs, but they were easy to scare away."

Pifko has used his global experience to develop accents in several languages, and his cornerstone character in stand-up comedy, which he does quite often, is an aggressive Israeli soldier who seduces women with ingratiating guile. In fact, he said, he considers comedy as the greatest theatrical art.

"It is the most naked art, but the best – to go in front of an audience all alone, and keep them interested."

Parody criticizes language law

Tevye the dairyman is transformed into Teddy, a Montrealer fighting to keep his business afloat, in a musical parody of Fiddler on the Roof.

The parody, Fiddler Sub-Terrain, written by Oren Safdie, 35, son of Canadian archiatect Moshe Safdie, opens Jan. 4 for a four-week run at La Mama Theatre in New York

Even though the play criticizes the language police who are harassing Teddy, the Quebec government has helped finance its New York run.

"When I told [the Quebec consul in New York] it was critical of Quebec, they said, 'We're not a censoring body.'"

Although Fiddler is one of his favourites, and he played in it in a Montreal high school production, Safdie says it needs to be brought up to date from its setting in turn-of-the-century Russia.

"My parody is about the loss of values and tradition, and morality being thrown out the window," he said.

A native of Montreal, Safdie said he has "given up" efforts to bring his work to Canadian audiences as a result of his experiences in bringing his early plays to Montreal where the only venue available was in bars.

In Fiddler Sub-Terrain, Teddy and Gilda (Golde in the original) live in Côte St.Luc, drive a Mercedes Benz, and have daughters who want green cards to work in United States.

Teddy, on the verge of bankruptcy, has run afoul of Quebec's language laws. While Tevye was a poor but honest man, Teddy is anything but.

Five of the 11 actors in his play are Jewish, but Safdie says two French-Canadians working in New York turned down roles because "it pushed too many buttons."

Though he is an architect – he graduated from Columbia University – he followed a different path than his father, turning to a life in theatre after a year of teaching architecture in Iowa.

"My father is not as well known in New York as he is in Canada so it has not affected my career here."

His previous play, Jews and Jesus, reflected his own experience in inter-dating, but the current one does not to the same extent.

"Is inter-marriage good or bad for the Jews?" he asked. "I don't have an answer, I don't think there is an answer."

Safdie spent more than a year in Los Angeles, where he wrote a TV pilot for CBS which has yet to see the light of day. Previously, he wrote the script for a movie, You Can Thank Me Later, starring Ellen Burstyn, Amanda Plummer and Genevieve Bujold.

"I'm very happy in my work; it's not a secure lifestyle, but I see a lot of people not doing what they want to do."

His father, who gravitates between Boston and Jerusalem, has a project at Ben-Gurion airport in Israel, and is planning a new city between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. He is also involved in some Toronto developments, his son said. —B. R.

Pains of Youth set in Vienna in 1923

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish theatre artist Joel Hechter is one producer who believes in authenticity, so he goes to the source.

In the case of Pains in Youth by Austrian-German playwright Ferdinand Bruckner, about the "lost generation" of World War I, Hechter has the support of the Austrian Embassy and the German Consulate.

Ferdinand Bruckner was a pseudonym for theatre producer, Theodor Tagger, who was born in Vienna. When the Nazis assumed power, he became a playwright in exile in Hollywood.

Hechter wants to bring Canadian theatre innovation to the international stage and his Theatre Voce Company is doing this with Pains in Youth at Canadian Stage, (upstairs) Berkeley Street from Jan. 17 to Feb. 3.

This is Theatre Voce's second production, the first being The Awakening which used Norwegian music and fiddle players to strengthen its realistic play.

Pains in Youth, recently translated by Daphne Moore, is set in Vienna in 1923.

The play explores the lives and relationships of seven young men and women as they fumble through the transition to adulthood without the support of a society, which no longer seems to care.

Co-artistic directors Anne Page and Hechter believe that the play is relevant today, citing the "desperate acts" of today's youth.

The cast of seven is composed of David Jansen, Linda Prystawska, Christopher Morris, Fiona Highet, Erin McKinnon, Page and Hechter.

For ticket information, call 416- 369-3110.

Book highlights historical synagogues

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Before the Holocaust, European towns like Casale Monferrato in Italy, Ioannina in Greece, St. Polten in Austria, Trebic in the Czech Republic, Vrbove in Slovakia and Papa in Hungary had viable Jewish communities.

Today, all that often remains of the Jewish presence in these places are synagogues, some of which are architecturally impressive and have been restored.

Several years ago, Rivka and Ben-Zion Dorfman, a retired American couple, travelled to Europe to visit these communities.

They've written a book about their trip, Synagogues Without Jews (The Jewish Publication Society), a handsome coffee-table volume filled with informative text and brimming with lavish full-color photographs.

In Casale Monferrato, east of Turin, the Dorfmans found that the local synagogue, ransacked by fascist thugs, had been renovated by regional authorities in 1969. Only seven Jewish adults and three children live in the town today.

The shul in Mondovi, west of Milan, was spared destruction because it was closed in the 1920s. A Christian family keeps the key and opens the synagogue for infrequent visitors. By the late 1980s, there was one Jew left in Mondovi.

Tucked into a steep, narrow alley, the synagogue in Dubrovnik, Croatia, is among the oldest in Europe. With a declining congregation, its future is uncertain.

Unable to care for their synagogue, the Serbian Jews of Subotica donated it to the municipality in 1979. The roof and the central dome, in danger of collapse, were repaired. But the building is in dire need of renovation.

Dozens of synagogues in Salonika, Greece, were destroyed by the Germans. The Veroia shul, though spared, has been unused for many years, and the entrance is overgrown with shrubs and weeds.

The mayor of the northern Greek town of Ioannina saved the synagogue, having convinced the Germans that he could put it to use as a library. Yet its days as a functioning shul may be numbered, given Ioannina's dwindling Jewish population.

The Wertheimer synagogue in Eisenstadt was one of the few in Austria not to be damaged by the Nazis. With no Jews left in Eisenstadt, it was converted into a Jewish museum.

Similarly, the synagogue in St. Polten was turned into the Institute for the History of Austrian Jewry.

Trebic, in the Czech Republic, is bereft of Jews. But in the spirit of gentrification, the Neuschul synagogue has become a culture hall and museum.

The shul in Jicin, whose Jewish community was also decimated, has yet to be fixed up.

Since there are not enough Slovakian Jews in Liptovsky Svaty Mikulas for a minyan, the synagogue was leased to a textile factory. In the 1990s, however, the original synagogue building was restored.

The facade of the synagogue in Vrbove, Slovakia – whose Jewish community is but a shadow of itself – has been renovated. But work on the interior has yet to begin.

Hungary's Jewish community suffered heavy losses during the war, and this is reflected in two of its synagogues.

In Apostag, were there are no longer Jews, the shul serves multiple purposes. It is a museum, concert hall and wedding chapel.

The synagogue in Papa, used for meetings and exhibits, is now padlocked.

The Dorfmans believe that, whenever possible, even abandoned synagogues should be restored. "Let them stand as monuments across the continent of Europe, each a witness to the kehillah that was born, flourished and vanished."

When Europe beckons

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

In shine or rain, Europe beckons, a destination for all tastes and budgets.

Before you leave on your vacation, study the following guidebooks, published by Lonely Planet and distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books. All are amply illustrated with colour photographs and detailed maps.

Greek Isles is a useful compendium of some 1,000 alluring islands in the Aegean and Ionian seas – from Ios to Rhodes – that have attracted tourists for generations.

Sweden steers you in the right direction, advising you what is worth visiting – Stockholm and the Bohuslan coast, for example – and what should be avoided, such as Drottningholm castle and the town of Arvika.

If cities in particular interest you, read Amsterdam, which highlights its manifold treats; Krakow, which comments knowingly on its Jewish historical sites; and Moscow, which debunks the stereotype that it is little more than an overgrown village.

If you bored with London, you're tired of life, Samuel Johnson once said. So consider these guides: London distills the best of a great city. On a more prosaic level, Cheap Sleeps in London and Cheap Eats in London will be appreciated by travellers on a tight budget.

Cheap Sleeps in Spain and Cheap Eats in Spain are also geared to tourists on a shoestring.

Finally, Walking in Ireland is tailor-made for those who would rather admire a rugged peak in Connemara than a mall in Dublin.

Odd couple: Issy Sharp and Saudi prince

Common values cement bond between businessmen

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's a relationship that seems to strain the limits of credulity.

The grandson of a Jewish chicken farmer and rabbi from Oswiecim (Auschwitz), Poland, and the grandson of the founder of modern Saudi Arabia have linked up as business partners.

Isadore (Issy) Sharp, a Jew and a Zionist, and Prince Alwaleed bin Talal bin Abdulaziz Al Saud, nephew of King Fahd of Saudi Arabia, have worked harmoniously for the past six years.

"Business brings people together," said Sharp, founder, chair and chief executive officer of Four Seasons, the largest luxury hotel/resort management company in the world. "There is no better way to bridge animosity than commerce."

At a time when a Palestinian uprising is roiling the Middle East yet again, and Arab states are at loggerheads with Israel, the thriving and profitable partnership between Sharp and Prince Alwaleed – a Four Seasons stockholder and the descendant of Abdel Aziz ibn Abdel Rahman (Ibn Saud) – stands out as a shining, if not improbable, example of Arab-Jewish synergy.

He and Sharp, the 1989 Negev Dinner honoree and the co-chair of the 1985 United Jewish Appeal, recently unveiled plans for new, state-of-the-art hotels in Riyadh, Amman, Cairo and Damascus, and a resort in Sharm el-Sheikh.

Sharp, who describes himself as "a very strong supporter of Israel," met the prince through an American intermediary, and formed an alliance with him after having decided to sell off a portion of his considerable holdings.

To hear Sharp tell it, the pair have really hit if off. "I maintain a very close and exceptional personal relationship with him," said Sharp, who spoke at a recent testimonial dinner in his partner's honour.

As he sees it, their bond is cemented by the glue of common values: integrity and trust.

Sharp, whose chain of 48 hotels and resorts is scattered throughout 20 countries from Canada and the United States to Germany and Japan, is currently building or planning to build 19 new properties around the globe.

And doubtless due to the prince's influence, Four Seasons is focusing on the Middle East as a focus for its ambitious expansion plans.

In addition to the projects in which he and the prince are jointly involved, Sharp and a bevy of other investors plan to build hotels in Jerusalem's Old City, in Qatar and in such storied Arab centres as Beirut and Alexandria.

Convinced that the Middle East – a region of chronic tension and instability – will eventually settle down and prosper, he is confident that Israel and its Arab neighbours will come to terms one fine day.

In the same vein, he believes that Israelis will be among the travellers gravitating to Four Seasons' Sharm el-Sheikh resort, scheduled to open this year.

Sharp, whose first foray into the hotel business occurred in Toronto 40 years ago, intends to double the size of his chain within a decade.

"We're on the threshold of the most exciting time in our history," said Sharp, who turned 69 last October.

Last year, Four Seasons, based in the leafy Toronto suburb of Don Mills, opened hotels in Mexico, the United States, Britain and France.

And in the near future, hotels and resorts will spring up in Whistler, B.C., as well as in San Francisco, Miami, the Bahamas, Costa Rica, Puerto Rico, Caracas, Dublin, Prague, Budapest, Shanghai and Côte d'Azur.

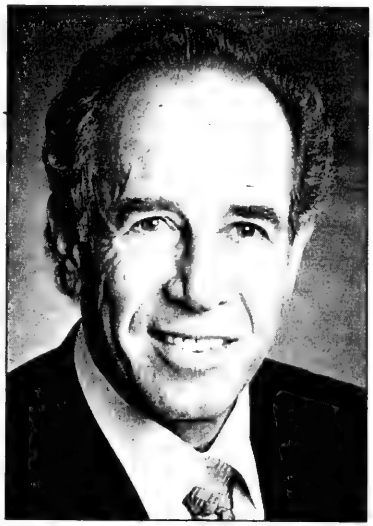
Sharp, whose mid-size five-star hostelries are renowned for excellence of service, owns three of the properties outright – in New York City, Vancouver and Berlin – and has an interest in several others.

A graduate of the Ryerson Polytechnical Institute (now Ryerson Polytechnic University) who was trained in architecture, he segued into the hospitality industry after working for his father during summer school breaks.

Max Sharp, a residential builder, was born in Poland and immigrated to Canada via Palestine in 1925.

"I always intended to go into the home building business," Isadore Sharp explained. "I studied architecture to gain knowledge of the business."

In 1955, when he was 24, he conceived the idea of opening a different kind of hotel in downtown Toronto. "It was a motel concept with hotel service."



Isadore (Issy) Sharp

He built the Four Seasons Motor Hotel on Jarvis Street, where land was relatively plentiful and cheap. It was finished in 1961 at a cost of $1.5 million, then a fabulous sum. He borrowed the money from family and friends.

Sharp sold the property in the early 1970s, and later it was razed to make way for a parking lot.

He erected his second hotel – the Inn on the Park on Leslie Street – in 1962. Subsequently, he launched the Inn on the Park in London, England, a stylish hostelry with impeccable standards, and the Four Seasons Sheraton, a 1,600-room convention hotel, in Toronto.

"The contrast between those hotels, one that was dealing with thousands of people a day, and the other a boutique-style operation, showed me clearly what I thought I could do best."

With a vision from which he has not deviated an iota since 1972, Sharp decided to concentrate exclusively on managing medium-size hotels of exceptional quality.

Catering to well-off, discriminating tourists, Four Seasons hotels and resorts are known for their locale, design, decor, original artwork, antiques and abundant displays of fresh flowers in public areas.

Above all, Sharp's palatial hotels and resorts have earned a reputation for personalized service of the highest order. And so, in an interview, he sang the praises of Four Seasons' workers near and far.

Asked the secret of his success, he ascribed it to his ability to deal fairly and empathetically with employees.

"That's all it takes," he said.

Warming to this theme, he added: "It's not what I can do, but what we can do as a group, the collective efforts of everyone working in harmony."

He and his wife, Rosalie, a stellar figure in Toronto's Ashkenaz Yiddish festival, have three sons, Jordan, Gregory and Anthony. A fourth son, Christopher, died of cancer in 1978.

Gregory, a computer specialist, was once on the Four Seasons' payroll, but runs his own company today. Anthony develops real estate, while Jordan operates a music store-cum school and a children's book shop.

A skier and a tennis and bridge player, Sharp travels around on inspection trips in a Challenger corporate jet. "It's a very big time-saver, especially on short trips."

When he is not surveying his properties abroad, Sharp – a governor of the board of Toronto's Mt. Sinai Hospital – spends his days in meetings with senior personnel of his managerial team.

Not surprisingly, he has no immediate plans to retire.

As he put it: "I'm in good health, and as long as I can add value to the company and enjoy it, I'll keep on doing it."

Sting's goalie gets thrown in the deep end

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Robert Gherson has seen a lot of rubber this year, a lot more than either he or the management of the Sarnia Sting might have expected.

In just one game versus the 23-5 Erie Otters, one of the best major junior teams in the country, he faced four outright breakaways – and stopped three of them.

As a rookie who turned 17 in October, he might have expected to play in perhaps half the Sting's games, leaving the major part of the goaltending duties to the team's more experienced returning netminder, Andrew Sim. But when Sim took off for what he thought would be greener pastures (the Mississauga Ice Dogs!), the full weight of the Sting's goaltending chores fell on Gherson's shoulders. The Toronto native has responded to the challenge with flying colours.

Rookie carries the load for OHL team

At the holiday break, Gherson had played in 27 of the team's 34 games. He sported a 3.38 goals against average and a .891 save percentage, which put him somewhere in the middle of the pack among OHL goalies.

Sarnia GM Terry Doran is pleased with Gherson's performance, given the circumstances. "For a young man to step in and be a No.1 goaltender, that's a lot of work. He's handled it very professionally...I think goaltending is the least of our problems."

The Sting at mid season are no better than a middling team. They sit in fourth place in the OHL's West Division, with 13 wins, 18 losses and a .426 percentage.They've been hit with plenty of injuries and one of their top scorers, Eric Himelfarb, came down with mononucleosis. Himelfarb, like Gherson one of a handful of Jews in the OHL, is still third in scoring for the Sting, despite missing 16 games. In the 18 he played, he bulged the twine for 11 goals and added 13 assists for 24 points.

Gherson, meanwhile, has been asked to bail out his teammates in lots of games. For his part he doesn't mind the work, but he is finding it difficult to play at a high level, game in and game out.

"The hardest thing has been getting mentally prepared every night," he said. "I feel good physically. It's hard getting up every night, but I'm getting more used to it."

Gherson's game is predicated on strong technical skills and intense concentration. A butterfly goaltender, he's quick and agile, getting down on the ice so his legs cover much of the lower part of the net. He's quick getting up and moving side to side. So far this season, that part of his game has improved.

'An elite goaltender for his age'

"The coaches tell me to play the way I play," he said. "I've just got to be ready mentally for every game."

Last year with the Wellington Dukes of the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA), the province's tier two junior circuit, he could afford to "take a night off," knowing he and the team were good enough to win despite a weak game. Not this year.

The players in the OHL are bigger, stronger, faster than those in the OHA and more of them can label a shot for the top corner, he said.

Gherson is up to the challenge and part way through the season, he has no doubt which was his best game, so far. Back in October he stopped 38 shots for his first OHL shutout against the Barrie Colts.

"That was one of the best games I've played in my life," he said.

As the season progresses, he expects his nerves may subside. "Once you go to every rink in the league, it becomes more comfortable," he said. "You know the boards, the fans. You don't have to be worried about what's going to happen."

So far, his favourite out of town rink is the Civic Centre in Ottawa, home of the 67s. "It's crazy," he said. "They have 10,000 people there and you can't hear anything."

Doran believes Gherson has what it takes to become a first rate goalie. "He's able to handle the highs and lows of the game very well. He believes in his abilities."

Technically, Gherson is sound and "he's very mature and focused when he plays...He's an elite goaltender for his age."

Nevertheless, Doran thinks there's room for improvement in Gherson's game. He needs to get better handling the puck and develop more consistency.

"If he continues to improve, I believe he has the ability to be a first round [NHL] selection," Doran said. "By the time he's 19, he could be the top goaltender in our league."

Robert Gherson faces a shooter in an OHL matchup. Gherson, a rookie, has provided the Sting with solid goaltending.

ספרותנו

נשים מתוך קטלוג: שלושה סיפורים, מאת: סביון ליברכט. הוצאת כתר, 2000.

הסיפור השני "הילד של דיאנה" מתאר זוג הורים ששכלו את בנם, איתן. בנוסף למות הבן על ההורים להתמודד עם העובדה שלבנם, איתן, צאצא ברחם מתנדבת זרה בקיבוץ, דיאנה מאירלנד. ההסתבכות הרגשית אצל ההורים מאוד מורכבת ואף גורמת להם להתאכזר לדיאנה. בסופו של דבר תמסור דיאנה את הבן הנולד להורים השכולים ונדמה שאיתן נולד מחדש.

About Food

Dear Norene

By NORENE GILLETZ

If you are a sugar addict, I highly recommend The Sugar Addict's Total Recovery Program by Kathleen DesMaisons, PhD (Random House). Her first book, Potatoes Not Prozac, has sold 170,000 copies and her Web site (www.radiantrecovery.com) has had more than five million hits in the past two years.

DesMaisons is a specialist in addictive nutrition. She explains how to free your mind and body from the tyranny of sugar and shake off the exhaustion, mental fogginess and mood swings that it causes. She offers seven steps to recovery in this easy-to-read, practical book:

1. Eat breakfast with protein.
2. Journal what you eat and how you feel.
3. Eat three meals a day with protein.
4. Take the recommended vitamins and have a potato (with the skin) before bed.
5. Shift from white foods to brown foods (e.g., substitute whole grains and high fibre for white flour products).
6. Reduce or eliminate sugars.
7. Create a new life.

This book is packed with menus,recipes and tips on how to implement her food plan, based on a careful balance of protein and slow-carbs, not low carbs. It is designed to change your blood chemistry and improve your neurotransmitter function. She stresses that the key to success is to go slowly and in sequence.

I decided to try these easy, tasty pancakes for breakfast. I added a chopped apple and topped them with yogurt. I felt virtuous, organized and clear-headed for the next few hours, until I ate a piece of chocolate. I don't think that was quite what she meant by brown foods!

COTTAGE CHEESE-CINNAMON PANCAKES

A great topping is to cook some frozen blueberries in a saucepan with a little water until syrupy.

1 cup rolled oats
1 cup low-fat cottage cheese
2 egg whites
2 tsp. vanilla extract
1/2 tsp. cinnamon
Milk
Fresh or frozen fruit

Chop oats in a blender or food processor; add cottage cheese and blend until mixture is smooth. Beat egg whites until fluffy. Add to oatmeal cheese mixture. Add vanilla and cinnamon. If batter seems thick, thin it by adding a little milk. After blending, stir in pieces of fresh or frozen fruit. Bake on a nonstick skillet or lightly greased griddle over medium heat, dropping batter onto the griddle using 2 tbsp. batter per pancake. Turn when edges are lightly browned. Makes 10 to 12 pancakes.

Security service warns: signs of 'anarchy' in PA

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Even if Palestinian Chairman Yasser Arafat decides to end attacks against Israeli targets, it may take up to six months before the Palestinian Authority (PA) is able to reassert its full control over the territories, a senior Israeli security source said last Sunday.

According to Israeli security assessments, the PA will have little difficulty bringing the Fatah activists and those belonging to the various Palestinian security organizations under control.

However, more independent cells and members of the radical Islamic organizations, Hamas and Islamic Jihad, will require months of intensive effort to limit their activities.

The senior Israeli security source described the current situation in the PA as showing "signs of anarchy," where the central authority is unable to assert its will, particularly in the West Bank.

Security assessments suggest that more than 80 percent of those involved in attacks against Israeli targets are known to the PA, but no efforts are being made to arrest them. Furthermore, Israeli sources say, the security co-operation between the two sides is effectively "dead."

To compensate for the lack of co-operation, the Israel Defence Forces and the Shin Bet security services are increasing their intelligence gathering efforts.

Since the outbreak of the violence in the territories in late September 2000, intelligence has been easier to gather.

This is because most of the activities are being carried out by members of Fatah, which is a lot less compartmentalized than the Hamas or Islamic Jihad cells and is therefore easier to penetrate.

Israeli intelligence assessments argue that there is a noticeable sense of fatigue in the Palestinian street because of the ongoing confrontation with Israel, and especially as a result of the severe economic impact it is having.

It is, however, doubtful whether the silent majority will come out against a continuation of the attacks against Israelis.

This fatigue does not seem to detract from the eagerness of various organizations in the PA to participate in attacks against soldiers of the Israel Defence Forces and settlers, according to the source.

PRAYER MEETING: Tens of thousands of Jews, came to the Kotel last week for a prayer meeting led by political leaders. The rally was called by the settlers' councils and other religious organizations in response to the present wave of Palestinian terror, as well as to galvanize public opinion against a possible agreement that would include ceding sovereignty of the Temple Mount. Further rallies were planned for this week. Here, from left, former Sephardi chief rabbi Mordechai Eliahou, Rabbi Haim Druckman and National Religious Party leader Yitzhak Levy lead prayers at the Kotel. [Israel photo]

The News in Brief

Canada

Action Urged On Art

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and the Canadian Museum Association (CMA) last week joined to urge museums and the federal government to act "quickly and firmly" in dealing with the issue of Nazi-confiscated art. CJC and the CMA plan a national meeting for museum and government representatives to produce an action plan that will help locate such art works and return them to their rightful owners.

Israel

Death Squads?

JERUSALEM — Palestinian militia leaders have created special units to track down and kill prominent Israelis, the daily Yediot Achronot reported last week. The paper said the initiative was launched after Israel Defence Force sources confirmed they were targeting Palestinian militants suspected of carrying out attacks against Israelis.

Free Study In Israel

JERUSALEM — First prize in an essay contest sponsored by the Arava Institute for Environmental Studies and the Jerusalem Report, is a free semester of study at the institute, located on Kibbutz Ketura. Students should answer the following question: What can the world learn from the environmental challenges of the Middle East? Essays should be no more than 2,500 words and submitted by e-mail no later than Feb. 28 to: essay@arava.org. For more information, visit www.arava.org

Bibi Will Help

JERUSALEM — Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he would help Opposition leader Ariel Sharon become Israel's next prime minister. Netanyahu, who recently dropped out of the running for the top job, said it was important to topple Prime Minister Ehud Barak.

Yummy and Nutritious

JERUSALEM — Hummus, the popular Mideast chickpea spread, can help keep you healthy, say researchers at Hebrew University. The researchers said hummus contains antioxidants that contribute to the prevention of heart disease and cancer.

Second Attack

RENO, Nev. — Thirteen months after five skinheads firebombed Temple Emanu-El in Reno, the same synagogue was attacked in the first hour of the New Year. Police said an arsonist apparently used a flammable liquid to ignite the fire, which engulfed the temple's front entrance and charred the entryway. Police officials, who classified the attack as a hate crime, had few clues, other than a poor-quality surveillance photo of the arsonist.

Yahoo! Pulls Nazi Items

NEW YORK —Web portal Yahoo! Inc. has announced that beginning Jan. 10, it will prevent the sale of Nazi memorabilia on its auctions, classified and shopping areas. The announcement comes about six weeks after a French court ordered Yahoo! to pay fines of $13,000 (US) a day, it if did not prevent Nazi memorabilia from being accessed on its site by French Internet users. Yahoo! denied the move was connected to the French ruling. A month ago, Yahoo!'s auction site listed more than 1,000 items related to the Ku Klux Klan or Nazism, including knives, CDs and daggers.

Standards Issued

NEW YORK — For the first time, rabbis of L'maan B'nos Yisrael International, a group dedicated to helping the plight of agunot (women whose husbands refuse to give them a religious divorce), have issued standards for batei din to deal with matrimonial problems. The standards are designed to eliminate many of the abuses stemming from current practices. The group recommends that people use the services of only those batei din which "strictly adhere to these well thought out and protective standards." For information call 718-338-0833.

Expresses Regret

SYDNEY — The governor-general of Australia recently wrote to the nation's Jewish leaders to express his "sincere regret" at the recent rash of anti-Semitic attacks. Sir William Deane said he wanted to express "how absolutely abhorrent every decent Australian finds the recent attacks on synagogues and Jewish property."

LOS ANGELES — Filmmaker Steven Spielberg has been named a Knight Commander of the British Empire by Queen Elizabeth for his contributions to the entertainment industry.

Politics Overshadow China Ceremony

BEIJING — Plans to honour "China's Schindler," a diplomat who saved thousands of Jews from concentration camps, are being overshadowed by tensions between China and Taiwan.

Israel's Holocaust memorial, Yad Vashem, is slated to bestow Righteous Among the Nations status to Dr. Ho Fengshan, a former consul general in Vienna who issued visas to every Jewish refugee who requested one, at the risk of his personal safety.

Ho's story came to light after his death in 1997. Relatives of those he saved will attend the Jan. 23 ceremony.

The development should be a triumph for Taiwan, which Ho represented as a diplomat for more than 40 years.

But his family has asked Yad Vashem to exclude all Taiwanese representatives from the ceremony. Ho's daughter, Ho Manli, said it would be "the height of hypocrisy" for Taiwanese officials to attend.

Not only did her father's employers officially condemn him for saving Jewish lives, they then "dishonoured" him at the end of his ambassadorial career with trumped-up corruption charges, Ho Manli said.

Ho's wife and daughter have asked Israel to invite the Communist People's Republic of China to attend the ceremony as the "true representatives of all 1.3 billion Chinese people."

Israeli minister rejects Palestinian demands

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The main Palestinian demands in the current peace talks are completely unacceptable to Israel, an Israeli cabinet minister said recently.

The Israeli government will neither grant the Palestinians exclusive sovereignty over the Temple Mount in eastern Jerusalem nor the right of their scattered refugees to return to their former homes in Israel, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak said in a year-end interview.

Amnon Lipkin-Shahak

With these comments, he appeared to reject the centrepiece of a package of American ideas in which Israel would cede full control of the Temple Mount in exchange for a Palestinian agreement to forego the demand that all Palestinian refugees be permitted to return to Israel.

Lipkin-Shahak, the chief of staff of the Israeli armed forces from 1995 to 1998, said that the "best solution" for the Temple Mount was the status quo.

Since the 1967 Six Day War, the Temple Mount – the site of the first and second ancient Jewish temples and of two mosques – has been administered by the Palestinians but controlled by Israel.

Clarifying his remarks, Lipkin-Shahak added, "I don't need sovereignty over the mosques, but I'll give no one sovereignty over the temples. The best solution is to continue with the present situation."

As for the Palestinians' insistence on the "right of return," he said, "we won't absorb them. Israel will not accept the right of return."

Claiming that the 1948 Arab invasion of the newly-created state of Israel was the cause of the Palestinian refugee problem, he said that Israel would be amenable to allowing some refugees to go back under the provisions of a family reunification program.

However, he refused to be drawn into a discussion of the number of such Palestinians Israel would likely be prepared to accept.

Lipkin-Shahak was interviewed after a press conference at the Park Hyatt Hotel organized by the Israeli consulate and the Israel Government Tourist Office. He flew into Toronto from New York City, where he attended a meeting designed to boost tourism to Israel.

According to the Tel Aviv daily, Ma'ariv, Lipkin-Shahak met secretly with a top Palestinian official in New York City in a bid to bridge the gaps between Israel's and the Palestinians' positions in the current round of peace talks.

His interlocutor was identified by the newspaper as Ahmed Queri, the speaker of the Palestinian legislative council and a key negotiator of the 1993 Oslo accords.

A founder of the Centre party and a member of the inner cabinet, Lipkin-Shahak was on the Israeli negotiating team at the failed Camp David summit last July. He accompanied Prime Minister Ehud Barak to a summit in Sharm el-Sheik shortly after the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

Lipkin-Shahak, who has been filling in as minister of transportation since the resignation of Yitzhak Mordechai in a sex scandal, led Israel's military team in negotiations with the Palestinians before the Oslo accord was signed.

At the press conference, he said that a peace pact could be within reach if Israel and the Palestinians manage to resolve four major issues: Jerusalem, security arrangements, Palestinain refugees and territory.

He expressed doubt whether these complex problems will be thrashed out before U.S. President Bill Clinton leaves office on Jan. 20.

Lipkin-Shahak warned that further Palestinian violence will make it increasingly difficult for the two sides to come to terms.

But he voiced confidence that a compromise deal will eventually be reached.

Six generation genealogy

From the editor's desk

The genealogist pulls treasures from the mine of time. These treasures – the gems often of meticulous, painstaking labour – are recorded and reattached as formerly fallen leaves, usually only for private eyes, on the family tree.

The Family Orchard by Nomi Eve is a very public prose explication of the many personal treasures that the author's bold imagination has plumbed from the hidden ore of six generations of her extended family's history.

It is a work of fiction, the author's first novel, but as she intends the reader to know, it is autobiographically based.

Spanning almost 200 years, the story of the family tree begins with the "roots" of the lives of two of the author's ancestors who lived in eastern Europe just after the turn of the 19th century but whose adult lives unfold in Palestine. Indeed most of the stories the author records unfold in Palestine and carry the reader on a time-travel through some of the key events in the settlement, creation and consolidation of the State of Israel.

Thus we read about the hardships and pleasures of life in the stone alleyways and along the ramparts of 19th-century Jerusalem, the travails of irrigating the first fields of Petach Tikvah and the exhilaration of seeing the growth of the sprawling, life-sustaining orchards of the communities of the coastal plain.

The last detail on the fictionalized tree is the bough of the author's own generation – herself, her siblings and her cousins.

Family Orchard is a unique, unconventional novel that elevates form to a plane almost as commanding as content.

The form of the prose is itself reminiscent of the classic scholarly "mines" of Jewish history from which much of subsequent Jewish literature has found great inspiration. The narration is written in a format that borrows from the folios of the Talmud.

The author records in bold print her father's recollections. His memories form the mishnah of the tale. Alongside the father's mishnah, set apart in both style and content, is the author's gemarah, her "elaborations upon" her father's authoritative propositions of fact. Eve's "gemarah" of course, is the creative nub of the novel.

To assist the reader in visualizing some of the detail of the author's descriptions, the novel is illustrated with more than 30 graphics, most of them reproductions of drawings and lithographs of 19th- and 20th-century Palestine, depicting scenes that many readers will be seeing for the first time.

But just as in the pages of the Talmud, l'havdil (to differentiate), there is much in the content of Family Orchard that I was unable to extract.

Eve writes in a style that reminds one of some of the modern Spanish and Latin American novelists whose prose flows with images of magic and metaphysics and whose style is as much poetry as it is prose.

There are elegant turns of phrase throughout the work. For example, in one scene from her grandfather's early childhood, Eve writes: "And so they grew up trying, with the clumsy grace of infant angels, to make the world smooth for the adults whom they loved, and for whom the roughness of everyday existence was obviously excruciating."

The phrase "clumsy grace of infant angels" is as delicate and fine an image as readers will find in modern literature.

Sometimes the meanings of certain passages in the text are obscured by the author's occasional resort to excessive descriptive devices. In these instances, the reader is prevented from fully appreciating the obviously detailed historical and other research in the work and from catching on to the multi-layered associations with Jewish lore and history that Eve has woven into the text.

In addition, Eve fills in the lives of some of her ancestors with details that spring from an imagination cultured in modern sensibilities and preoccupations that seemed to this reader too physically oriented, unnecessary and almost culturally anachronistic.

Adding to the complexity of the text is the differentiation in the narrative between what is "told" to the reader from what is "written." To be fair to Eve though, she does hint very broadly at these complexities and differentiations in the narrative at the very outset of the novel.

Still, Family Orchard is a fascinating read, a testament of a modern writer, devoted to her craft, her family and her people who follows the imperative of her heart, namely, to write.

Kahane supporters setting up fund to aid 'legion'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian supporters of Binyamin Kahane are establishing a fund to assist residents of West Bank territories who will join a proposed "Jewish Legion."

The Legion will act as a self-defence force for "Jews who fight back" against Arab attacks in Judea and Samaria, while the fund will go to the families of those volunteers who may, as a result, be arrested by Israeli authorities, said Meir Halevi, chair of the Jewish Defence League (JDL) in Canada.

Halevi said the fund was conceived in the aftermath of the murder of Kahane and his wife, Talia. The Kahanes were killed by gunfire while driving near the West Bank town of Ofra. Three of Kahane's six children were also injured in the attack. Two are in critical condition.

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) condemned the murders. "This is not an issue of Kahane's politics, which the Knesset determined were an affront to its democratic values," the CIC stated in a release. "It is about a murder involving a family.

"There is evidence this was not a random shooting but the result of a deliberate, well-organized plot to assassinate Mr. Kahane and his family. It came only one day after Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement called for an escalation of violence, including attacks on prominent settlers, to mark the 36th anniversary of the founding of the PLO.

"Canada and other members of the international community must emphasize to Arafat, in no uncertain terms, that violence will not be tolerated," the CIC stated.

Binyamin Kahane was the son of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, the Brooklyn-born founder of the JDL and the Kach movement in Israel. He was assassinated in New York 10 years ago.

Unlike his firebrand father, Binyamin Kahane was soft-spoken, almost bookish.

"He was meek, but he was fiercely committed to further what his father called 'the Jewish idea,'" Halevi said. "In a nutshell, that means Jews should control their own destiny and in practical application, that means living in Israel and trying to carry on as normal a life as possible.

"It also means, you are either for Jerusalem, or you're not; you are either for the Jewish right to live anywhere in Israel, or you are not; you're either for Arab imperialism, or you are not. We do not believe in a peace plan with Arab imperialism, which will not be satisfied until all Israel is theirs," Halevi said.

Only two weeks before his death, Kahane was in Toronto where he addressed 130 supporters, and discussed the proposed Jewish Legion, Halevi continued.

"He spoke of the need for Jews to form a legion in Judea and Samaria, to protect Jews living in those areas. He hoped the [Israeli] army would leave so people could take matters into their own hands and defend themselves."

The rationale for a legion is simple, Halevi said: "The Israeli army is under orders from [Prime Minister Ehud] Barak himself not to protect the settlers, so they're sitting ducks."

The legion would consist of settlers, army volunteers and others who wish to patrol West Bank roads to make them safe for Jewish travellers, he added.

The proposed fund would be raised to assist the families of those legion members, and others acting in self-defence, who may be arrested for their self-defence actions. The money would fund their legal defence and pay family expenses while the arrested breadwinner awaits trial, he said.

Currently, settlers must weigh a response to Arab provocations against the chance the army will arrest them and leave their family bereft of financial support, Halevi said.

Halevi said attacks on Jewish travellers are a daily occurrence, though largely unreported in the press. On the day the Kahanes were killed, eight other shooting incidents occurred with settlers as targets, he said. Halevi was confident that a substantial contributor base exists in Toronto to help kick start the proposed fund. Similar efforts will be undertaken in the United States, Halevi said, noting that the Kahane Web site received thousands of e-mails a day in the aftermath of the shooting.

A memorial service for the Kahanes was scheduled for Tuesday, Jan. 9 in Thornhill, Ont.

THE TORONTO JEWISH HEALING PROJECT

The purpose of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project is to publicize and promote programmes, activities, and resources from a Jewish perspective for those seeking spiritual, physical and emotional healing.

The Toronto Jewish Community has recognized that Judaism has an enormous amount to say about illness and healing through the study of sacred texts, rabbinic commentary, midrash, music, ritual and stories

Cantor Moses returns to Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Somewhere along the way to earning his MBA at York University, Eric Moses realized how much he was enjoying the part-time jobs he had taken in the Jewish community to finance his education.

After graduation, he put business aside to study at the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute for three years. At 25, fresh out of the cantorial program and still unsure about a long-term commitment, the young tenor signed a three-year contract with Montreal's Shaare Zion Congregation.

"It was such a positive experience that here I am doing the same thing," he said in a recent interview at Beth Sholom Synagogue, where he replaced Israel Gutman, who retired to pursue business interests, at the beginning of January.

Moses left Montreal officially in December, after commuting between the two synagogues for several months, during which time he took on bar mitzvah students here and organized an adult choir which will sing at the traditional Conservative-style services on a monthly basis.

Cantor Eric Moses

For the 30-year-old Sudbury native, returning to Toronto was something of a homecoming. "It was important to come back to the community that enabled me to become a chazzan," he said, referring to the Toronto Council of Chazzanim, which provided money from its trust fund for his training.

Also, he noted, both his family and that of his wife, psychologist Melissa Lieberman-Moses, live here.

As a university student, Moses (no relation to Shaare Zion's Rabbi Lionel Moses) worked at Adath Israel Congregation, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Beth Tzedec Congregation, Camp Ramah and Temple Sinai. He sang in Adath Israel's choir, and was a youth director and bar mitzvah teacher.

He attributes his musical ability to his mother, a music teacher. His training in piano and classical voice dates back to his early childhood.

Living in Sudbury in a community of perhaps 30 Jewish families until age 12, Moses attended a one-classroom Hebrew school three days a week.

His paternal grandfather, the synagogue gabbai, was a Romanian immigrant who established a general store (later a menswear store) in Sudbury. He died when Moses was very young, but the cantor takes pride in serving "a synagogue where he would have felt proud to daven."

At age 12, Moses and his family moved to London, Ont., where they began attending services more regularly. He also became involved in United Synagogue Youth, the youth movement of Conservative Judaism.

Cantor Joseph Freiman at London's Congregation Or Shalom, encouraged him to become a chazzan, but the youngster didn't take him seriously at the time.

Following his bar mitzvah, however, Moses used to bicycle once a week to morning minyan, where he was taken under the wing of the regular daveners. "Why? Because I felt it was important, because I knew I'd become part of this club...and you know, the average age was not 13 years old!"

He doesn't see his shift from being a reggae-loving teen to a traditional cantor as terribly radical. He still enjoys a variety of music, including rock 'n roll.

A year in Israel, on the Hebrew University of Jerusalem's overseas program, was a formative experience. "It ignites something in your Jewish soul. Israel always has something to offer."

At the Cantorial Institute, which is under the auspices of Israel's Chief Rabbinate, Moses – with his blue jeans and baseball hat – counted among his fellow students many black-garbed Israeli chassidim.

"We'd ride the bus together to school, go to concerts together," he said, sitting behind his desk in a grey pinstriped suit. "There's a mutual respect for the craft."

To Moses, it's a "sad reality" that relatively few young Jews want to pursue chazzanut as a career.

For him, the appeal lies in being able to make a difference in people's lives.

Although he laments the trend away from traditional chazzanut – and in some congregations away from having a chazzan altogether – he said that to be successful, a cantor has to strike a balance between old and new.

Sometimes he will "throw in" music popularized by a Broadway show or a singer like Andrea Boccelli, and then, having captured congregants' attention, will segue to traditional nusach. Popular music can put congregants "on the same wavelength" as the cantor, he believes.

"We have to find a way to make [the synagogue experience] meaningful."

Ruth says his final goodbyes to Baycrest Centre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Sam Ruth left Cleveland 44 years ago to accept a position with the Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Hospital, he could not have imagined that he would become known as an adviser on the care of the elderly.

Ruth has been at the forefront of the development of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, as it grew from a small old folks' home to a world-renowned leader in geriatrics.

Sam Ruth

Nor would he have envisioned himself as a pathfinder in the development of innovative advances in the care of the elderly and a professional sought after for advice. Ruth, 79, has shared his expertise with Italian, Chinese, Japanese communities and with other seniors' health care services.

Ruth recently retired after having served as chief executive officer of Baycrest Centre for 25 years, as founding president of the Baycrest Centre Foundation for almost 10 years and as a staff consultant until his retirement.

His boundless energy on behalf of others has brought him many prestigious community positions and honours. He has been chair of the advisory committee of Metro Toronto Homes for the Aged, a Life Fellow of the American College of Hospital Administrators, an assistant professor in the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Toronto, and a consultant for government ministries and health councils.

Ruth believes that "a busy life leads to a more fruitful and happy life as one enters a new phase of life."

He says he has always had a feeling for history "and I am enrolling in a course leading to a diploma in the history of medicine. As well, I would like to renew my acquaintance with my Jewish roots, which I think formed my humanistic view of life."

A low-key visionary whose name has become synonymous with the care of the elderly, Ruth will continue to be sought after for his knowledge, integrity and helpful attitude.

Born in Chicago, Ruth lived in foster homes from the time he was seven years old. He first showed his penchant for leadership when he became the founder and aleph gadol of an AZA chapter when he was 18.

After he returned from the U.S. army, where he was discharged with the rank of captain, he returned to school and earned an MBA in health care from the University of Chicago.

He was serving as a hospital administrator when Sidney Liswood, a colleague from Boston who was then administrator of the Mount Sinai Hospital here, suggested that he take a position at Baycrest. Ruth says he accepted because Baycrest was integrated with Mount Sinai, and "I could see that there was a good deal of foresight on behalf of the community. I never regretted my decision to come to Toronto."

Ruth gives credit to the communal leaders who shared his concept of "a continuum of care," a progression of different levels of health and residential services needed as people age.

"The early pioneers at Baycrest were not only for ourselves but dedicated to the concept of raising the level of care for the elderly. People like Walter Lyons, Dr. Henry Himel and others helped build this wonderful institution," he says.

He adds that in Toronto, we have been fortunate in having the community involved and responsible for the direction of the organization.

Ruth says the future of caring for the aged lies in the direction of helping people live as normal a life as possible. Although there is a need for residential and chronic care facilities, greater emphasis is being placed on helping people live in the community.

"Old age is ageless. Most older individuals don't want to be categorized. With medical, social and economic gains made in the past years, old age keeps getting older. Whereas, when I started in 1956, an individual in his or her late 60s or early 70s was looked upon as being an alter [older person], today some in their 90s and over 100 are fully participating in life."

He emphasizes that because of our extended life span, community services must continually be expanded to meet the social and economic needs of an older group of people.

Ruth has an optimistic view of the future. "Nancy, my wife of almost 50 years, deserves more meaningful time. Although she is very busy herself, she is a past president of Holy Blossom Temple, acting director of education, and she is involved with the international board of the World Union for Progressive Judaism. I look forward to enjoying more time with her, with our three sons, Alan, John and Daniel, who are all involved in some form of health care, and our six grandchildren."

Ominous future

Israelis vote in less than one month for a new prime minister from between two candidates, neither one of whom will likely be able to command the necessary parliamentary confidence of the Knesset for more than a perfunctory period of time, if at all. As of this writing, Ehud Barak trails Ariel Sharon by a wide margin in public opinion polls. Barak has already agreed to a dissolution of the Knesset; Sharon's Likud party controls barely 20% of the Knesset seats.

In truth, the election is less about the next prime minister than it is about the next phase of relations with the Palestinians. And Yasser Arafat, the well-travelled President of the Palestine Authority and Chairman of the PLO, has already wielded the greatest influence on Israeli public opinion in that regard. His prevarications and lies have assured that Israeli-Palestinian relations will fall into a dark hole where distrust is the prevailing atmosphere and violence its habitual monster. As Thomas Friedman, New York Times columnist, recently wrote, Arafat's decision to unleash the 14 week-old intifadah "crushed those in Israel who argued that the Palestinians had made a strategic choice for peace."

Yet despite its ugliness and its heavy toll on life, limb, families and economy, it is not really the ongoing violence that creates the heavy weight of the existential burden that leaves so many Israelis, and other supporters of peace, feeling "crushed." It is, rather, the realization that the ultimate aims harboured "even" by the Arafat-led Palestinians, Israel's onetime "partners in peace," are completely incompatible with the existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East.

Nothing drives this point home more convincingly than Arafat's and his officials' insistence upon a "right of return" for Palestinian refugees.

This "right of return" is coded language understood by all in the region, Jews and Arabs, for the elimination of Israel as a Jewish state. Even the most left-leaning Israelis, willing to offer far-reaching compromises on Jerusalem, recoil at the thought of a Palestinian "right of return."

Yet Arafat and his leadership persist in their demand that Israel acquiesce in its own dismantling. "There can be no peace without... first and foremost its [the Palestinian people's] right of return," Sahar Habash, a member of the central command of Arafat's PLO, said last week.

Can there be any doubt, when one adds Arafat's insistence on the Palestinian "right of return" to his denial of any Jewish link to Jerusalem, that the next phase of Israeli-Palestinian relations will be more ominous than ever?

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Israelis don't glorify dead

In his column "Ferreting out the true story" (CJN, Dec. 21), Paul Michaels gives the CBC's Neil Macdonald too much credit.

Regarding Macdonald's "look behind the surface" in the Issam Judeh case, Macdonald does not choose sides between the Israeli narrative and the Palestinian version of the cause of Judeh's death; rather, he lets the viewer decide. Indeed, he concludes that truth itself has become a "relative concept," implying that objective facts cannot be established.

Unfortunately, Israelis themselves become victims of this approach when Macdonald unjustly concludes that both Israelis and Palestinians "glorify their own dead." There is simply no equivalence on Israel's side to the grotesque form of martyrdom that the Palestinians parade before the cameras to elicit the world's sympathy.

Uncontrollable fringe element

I have no doubt that the majority of Muslims and Arabs love their children and will do what any parent would do to protect them. There is, however, a fringe element in Islam that seems to be uncontrollable by peace-loving people.

During the Iran-Iraq war, Iran used children as mine detectors. Saddam Hussein prefers to have Iraqi children starve to death while he builds opulent castles for himself and his cronies. Currently, young children are pushed forward by armed Palestinians as a buffer between themselves and Israeli soldiers, with the inevitable result that many are killed in the crossfire.

Why don't responsible Muslim religious and political leaders condemn this perverse use of children? It is all too easy to attribute the recent rioting in the West Bank and Gaza to Palestinian frustration, but Yasser Arafat has the armed forces to control the fringe elements under his authority whose aim is obviously to sabotage any meaningful peace and to eventually destroy the State of Israel.

A higher being, not human beings

I find it ironic that in his review of Dr. Robert Buckman's book, Can We Be Good without God? (CJN, Dec. 14), Bernard Baskin quotes Buckman as saying human beings should follow their "herd-instinct" and thus not need a God. (I am rephrasing this.) The quote is, "Stop and think about the effect of what you are about to do on the people you are about to do it to."

In the same issue, there is an article about serious nursing cutbacks at Baycrest Centre. Nowhere does it state in this article what the impact will be on older people who consider the Jewish Home to be their "home." It was difficult enough for most of them to give up their former homes and enter institutional life. Now a number of them will have to move again. While the Ontario government clearly does not view chronic care needs with compassion, it is also true that families and residents needed to be involved in the dialogue prior to the decisions that were made. Perhaps families might have been proactive politically and actually "marched on the legislature."

None of us can rely on the goodwill of humans. We can try, but ultimately our faith must come from a God who will hear our pleas for help and bring some comfort. It is obvious that pleas for help cannot be met by downsizing, and so one turns to prayer with a hope for survival against great odds.

Offended by non-kosher ad

I am writing with dismay in response to your Jan. 4 issue of The CJN. It has long been an area of disappointment for me that the newspaper freely features advertisements for non-kosher restaurants.

The newspaper makes no claim to endorse the non-kosher status of these establishments, so there is no misrepresentation, only great insensitivity to one of the basic tenets of Judaism. In my opinion, a full-page ad in colour on the back page of the Jewish community's weekly newspaper, advertising not only the restaurant, but also describing the breakfast menu in bold, descriptive lettering, is offensive beyond description. Is there not a screening process in terms of what is appropriate for this publication? How low must "we" go?

Flip the paper over and you see the listing of the week's parshah and candlelighting time. Is it just me or does something here just not fit?

The plain truth—a lamentation for Israel

By DONALD CARR
Special to The CJN

Jerusalem, Dec. 25, 2000 (Christmas and the fourth day of Chanukah): the rain has been pelting for hours — much needed in this country.

The media blame Bethlehem's being deserted on the Israelis (although it is the Palestinian Authority's roadblocks that prevent entry, while the Israelis let through all those Christians who wish to pray). The commentators say nothing about the state of affairs in Jerusalem.

We walk the streets as the clouds lift for a while and a cold winter sun breaks through. Streets, hotels, jewelry stores, galleries and museums are empty, bereft of tourists.

One cannot help but be reminded of the opening verses of Lamentations, even though it is Chanukah and not Tisha b'Av: "How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! How has she become as a widow! She that was great among the nations and princess among the provinces, how has she become tributary!

"She weepeth sore in the night and her tears are on her cheeks; she hath none to comfort her among all her lovers; all her friends have dealt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies."

Yes, how treacherously the Jews in the Diaspora have dealt with Israel in her time of need. A warning from the U.S. State Department about travel in the area has been echoed by a Canadian government caveat, and planned visits either remain unbooked or are cancelled. A bar/bat mitzvah tour with 400 people signed up is reduced to less than a busload, many "first-time" children (my wife's and my grandchildren among them) and their parents.

We have a son who lives in Washington. I warrant that there are huge areas of that city more dangerous than all of the places where tourists would be taken to here.

Nevertheless, the blame cannot be placed only on those of us abroad. It falls equally upon the powers-that-be in Israel. September and October saw the breast-beating that Israel was losing the television war, that its hasbarah (information service) was lacking and that a determined, interdisciplinary effort was to be made. The Foreign Ministry, the Ministry of Tourism and the Ministry of Defence, therefore, all cooperated to change Israel's image.

The result? Nothing. Worse than nothing. By and large, a parade of unsophisticated, badly dressed spokesmen with broken English have appeared opposite the likes of Hanan Ashrawi and Edward Said — polished, articulate representatives of the Palestinian Arabs, adept at deflecting unwanted questions.

Ashrawi and Said unblinkingly create a false atmosphere of a poor, besieged Palestinian people striving for freedom. They conjure up the image of an Israeli juggernaut, intent on shooting unarmed children and strangling the "indigenous peoples of the occupied territories" economically.

Surely there are some present-day Abba Ebans and Chaim Herzogs, men and women capable of transmitting the truth in understandable English, capable of making the case for those who are really besieged — besieged in a sliver of land surrounded by millions of enemies in 22 Arab countries, with an outer circle of cynical self-interested United Nations members, including European and European-minded duplicitous seekers of "even-handedness" and "justice." Surely they must exist — although they may belong to the wrong party and will not be used.

Whether Prime Minister Ehud Barak or Likud leader Ariel Sharon wins, the results of the upcoming prime ministerial election must inevitably be futile. The Knesset will remain the same, with decision-making dependent upon economic wheeling and dealing and power-brokerage of the worst kind. Israel has a flawed electoral system to start with, allowing small, splinter parties to have the balance of power. This flaw, coupled with the direct election of the prime minister, only makes for gridlock in a politically immature society.

In addition, Barak has persuaded Minister of Regional Co-operation Shimon Peres, who has never won an election himself, not to run against him in the upcoming election. Instead, he has enlisted Peres to attract Arab voters to support him. What a wonderful way to try to cling to office in a Jewish state!

Successive prime ministers of Israel, including Barak, have committed to submit any proposed peace agreement to the Israeli public in a referendum. Barak hopes to have some "agreement" before Feb. 6, the day of the election. Is he intending to convert that election into the promised referendum, so that if he wins, that victory will be taken as approval by the electorate of any peace agreement negotiated before that date? If so, that's somewhat different from a referendum on the specifics of an agreement.

Another part of the blame for Israel's lack of Jewish visitors, of course, falls squarely on the North American media.

For example, a Tel Aviv bus is bombed and there are casualties. A CNN Jerusalem correspondent responds to questions from the anchor in CNN's Atlanta headquarters by saying, "Yes. Things are tense throughout Israel, as they have been for some time. And there is now a very tight security clamp, with armed soldiers and police everywhere" (my emphasis).

Of course, for the past 50 years there have been armed guards in Israel's sensitive places, probably in somewhat greater numbers than previously. But as we walk the city streets, shop and travel across town, from the Jerusalem Mall in the south to our son and his family in the northern Ramot district, we don't see a single armed guard or police officer. The children's tour goes to the Galilee, the Golan, the Judean desert, the Dead Sea, Masada and Eilat undisturbed.

Just listen to the reporters, however — fear, death and destruction lurk behind every corner for every visitor.

It's not only Israel's weather that's depressing; the country's population is dispirited. In addition to their hurting from the Diaspora's desertion of Israel and the political manoeuvering in the Knesset, people feel that the Israel Defence Forces in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza Strip are not allowed to use their full capabilities to protect the country's inhabitants.

The news from Washington is also dispiriting. Maybe PA Chairman Yasser Arafat's intransigence will come to the rescue once again and the concessions that Barak, Peres and others appear too ready to make will merely be remembered as "near misses" of self-destruction, as a result of his saying "no."

In one Dry Bones cartoon, one Israeli says to another: "A terrorist chieftain, a lame duck president and a resigned Israeli prime minister were talking." His listener asks if that is a joke. The first Israeli responds, "Yes… and the joke is on us!"

Our Israeli friends and relatives, whether on the left or the right, do not have any answers for what is happening, and some have very little hope. They cannot conceive of either the safety (from a pragmatic point of view) or the justification (from a peoplehood standpoint) of giving up sovereignty over such places as the Temple Mount. A recently publicized map, showing which "settlements" (a horrendous translation from the Hebrew for well-established towns and cities) were expected to be given up, provoked an audible groan of despair, as the public realized for the first time the extent to which its "negotiators" were prepared to "make concessions for peace."

I have long espoused that we in the Diaspora have no right to criticize political/military decisions made in Israel. We do not live there, we are not exposed to the dangers which Israelis face. Most of us don't have children obliged to serve in the IDF.

However, when it comes to the issue of giving up sovereignty over the Temple Mount and other parts of Jerusalem, I believe that Jews throughout the world do have a say. For centuries, we have prayed daily for a return to Zion, facing eastward in the direction of the Temple. Jerusalem is not only the heart and soul of Israel, it is also the heart and soul of our people.

Arafat believes that he is responsible to Muslims the world over for what happens to Jerusalem and the two mosques on the Temple Mount, notwithstanding that the Koran says nothing whatsoever about Jerusalem. How much more is the responsibility of Israeli leaders when dealing with what is part of the centrality of our religious existence! They have the burden of holding those places in trust for the entire Jewish people. Many of them, unfortunately, seem to have abandoned the religious aspects of our peoplehood, as so many have done throughout the country.

A suggestion has been made for the PA to have sovereignty over the surface of the Temple Mount, but not over what lies below, for it is believed that that is the site of the ruins of both the First and the Second Temples and that those ruins should be protected. Are we to accept a signature on a piece of paper as a guarantee for that? Arafat's signature?

Even under the current situation, where Israel exercises control over the Temple Mount, for months now, the Wakf — the Muslim trust responsible for the Mount — has been excavating huge areas, under the pretext of extending surface paving. Tons of earth have been dumped outside the Old City, with no examination of its contents. Remains of pillars dug out of the ground lie abandoned. Ancient stones, ripped apart, lie in piles along the sides of the old pathways. Clues to our history and past religious practices have been lost forever.

And who will prevent stones (or more lethal projectiles) from being hurled from the Mount onto the Jews praying at the Kotel, immediately below?

In my last article (Nov. 16), I wrote that the Israel-Arab conflict is not just about territory but about religion. In this holy war, Arab Islamists will not be satisfied so long as there is, in their eyes, an alien cancer of a Jewish State in the midst of an Islamic-endowed region. Arafat is seen by his co-religionists as a latter-day Saleh a Din, bent on repeating the expulsion of the infidels from "Arab lands." The Jews would be first, but the Christians would be next.

A letter in the Jerusalem Post from a Ramat Gan resident put the issue succinctly: "Two thousand years ago, a child was born in Bethlehem into a family which claimed a Jewish presence dating back nine centuries to King David and his son Solomon. The child was circumcised and raised in Judaism, later to attend and even preach in the synagogue of Jews. All of this occurred over 600 years before the first Muslim was born in a foreign land to the south.

"If this same child were to enter Bethlehem today, chances are that he would be lynched as a Jew and his 'right-wing settler' parents condemned in the world media for provoking the local population.

"He would discover that all vestiges of Jewish culture, language and religion in Bethlehem had been systematically erased by descendants of that foreigner from the south."

The writer might well have added that Christians now make up only about two percent of the population in that town.

Canada is no exception

From time to time, I have used this column to talk about the persistence of racism in Canada and an oft-voiced dislike among some Canadians of foreigners coming to our country. Unfortunately, these two sentiments are frequently linked, as a recent report from the Canada Council for Refugees makes clear. Here are some of its observations:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"The UN World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance, to be held in 2001 in South Africa, offers the Canadian Council for Refugees an opportunity to address concerns over the course of restrictionism and discrimination in refugee and immigration policies around the world.

"Intolerance of refugees and immigrants, xenophobia and racism are intricately linked. Indeed, in Canada, where open expression of racist ideas is generally not tolerated, hostility towards newcomers serves as an outlet for the expression of underlying racist sentiments. This is especially true in times of economic or political difficulty, when those with less power, including newcomers, are easy scapegoats for the shortcomings of society.

"Anti-refugee and anti-immigrant prejudices foster hostility and violence against newcomers, and result in official policies that infringe on the rights of non-citizens. To break this vicious circle, it is essential that government take strong action against racism and xenophobia.

"Canada has in recent years been recognized internationally for its liberal immigration and refugee policies. It is known for its refugee protection system ..., its resettlement program and its active immigration program. Canada has signed numerous international human rights instruments. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides a fundamental safeguard of the human rights of all persons in Canada, whatever their status."

Nevertheless, racism and discrimination remain part of Canadian reality. They are manifested at a personal level in the way individuals are sometimes treated. They are also manifested at the systemic level, through the way government may function. Bureaucrats have their own agenda, which does not necessarily coincide with the policies of the ministers. And as for Jews, we are not altogether exempt from indulging in these cardinal sins that have no place in Canada and that we should be committed to erase and never to support.

In fact, we Jews should be in the forefront of fighting for the rights of minorities, amongst whom refugees occupy an important place. Many of us still recall that infamous bureaucrat who, when asked how many Jews should be admitted to Canada, said: "None is too many."

We detest his sentiment and should vigorously object when, in our day, it is directed toward others in need of safety.

Making the case for Israel

The latest intifadah has created a new, confusing reality, not just in Israel, but in Jewish communities as well. The election nobody wanted is as much the product of Israel's weak electoral system as it is of Ehud Barak's poor performance. As Benjamin Netanyahu astutely noted, no prime minister can create a viable coalition in the current Knesset. Israel will undergo one of the shortest election campaigns in its history, and Barak is likely to be remembered as the greatest disappointment in the country's political annals.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

In a surprising finding in recent polls, young Israelis do not support Barak or the deal he has been negotiating with the Palestinians. More than 50 percent of Israelis between the ages of 18 and 35 support Ariel Sharon, and more than 60 percent of them object to the terms of the deal presented thus far. These voters have little historical knowledge of those aspects of Sharon's military career that concern older Israelis. The Lebanon war, which Sharon initiated, the Sabra and Shatila massacres, and more distant events such as controversial commando raids against Arab targets in the '50s are all irrelevant to the younger generation. They will vote for Sharon's experience and against Barak's handling of the negotiations and domestic affairs.

For Jewish communities in North America, the last few months have posed a host of new political challenges. Barak's peace deal turns upside down several beliefs that many still hold dear, such as evacuation of settlements, formation of a Palestinian state and some form of shared sovereignty in Jerusalem.

The real possibility of Sharon's election as prime minister brings back memories of condemnation by western governments of the Menachem Begin and Yitzhak Shamir governments' settlement policy, and vicious criticism of Sharon in the aftermath of Sabra and Shatila.

For those Canadian Jews who have been involved in the business of Israel advocacy for several decades, tough times are nothing new. But for our own younger generation, especially on campuses today, the latest intifadah has been especially unsettling. Like their Israeli counterparts, they lack historical memory. Two decades ago, the Jewish community took Israel advocacy on campus seriously. The onslaught of pro-Palestinian activity in the '70s and '80s resulted in a deliberate effort to create a generation of student activists, bolstered by supportive faculty, who could make the case for Israel effectively. Organizations like Canadian Professors for Peace in the Middle East and the Canada-Israel Foundation for Academic Exchange actively planned programs for students and faculty to balance the pro-Palestinian campaigns.

In contrast, over the last decade, our efforts have been focused on issues of Jewish continuity and identity – and with good reason. As the peace process unfolded, Arab activists became silent, and as our communities became more and more assimilated, the concern turned inwardly to our own future. As a result, we have a generation of Jewish students who may know more about their Jewish identity, but who are ill-equipped to deal with the challenge of a propaganda war on campus.

There is no direct analogy to the events of 20 years ago. Then, the PLO was taboo, and the mere mention of a Palestinian state was heresy. We cannot make the case today using yesterday's arguments. Today's students need to know the history of the conflict, to be sure, but especially the history of the last decade, in which the language has been redefined, and the relationship with the Palestinians redrawn.

They need to understand the debate over Jerusalem – in today's terms, and the nuances of the right of return as it is currently discussed. They need to understand what Israelis have been prepared to concede for peace, and where they draw the line; and how the Palestinians have chosen to react – with violence and vicious rhetoric. Most importantly, they need to be able to effectively respond to a sophisticated, media-wise Palestinian presence on campuses.

Fortunately, the community's leadership and Israel's representatives in Canada are rising to the challenge. We can make no better investment in our future. In addition to cementing links between our young people and Israel, we must equip them to be advocates here at home. They will become more confident as Jews and Canadians, and we will be better served as we make the case for Israel – yet again.

The continuing strength of Yiddish

Yiddish refuses to die. In mid-December, the distinguished columnist for Toronto's Globe and Mail, Jeffrey Simpson, used the word "schmozzle" several times to describe the American election fiasco.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Many Jews, including Yiddish speakers, might not be familiar with the word. The Oxford English Dictionary defines schmozzle as a "muddle" or "quarrel," a slang word common in London's East End, with usage beginning early in the 20th century. The OED claims it is likely derived from the more familiar Yiddish schlemazel, meaning misfortune or unlucky person.

Simpson, and the editors who had the word in the column headline, had no compunction about using it, and felt confident that the largely non-Jewish Globe readers would understand its meaning. And they were right. For the fact is, schmozzle sounds like a chaotic, pathetic, mess.

This, then, is the fate of Yiddish. As Yiddish declines as a language of daily communication except among certain chassidic groups and elderly Europeans, it is absorbed steadily into English. (This is one reason that Jews, and particularly Ashkenazi Jews, will always feel more at home in English-speaking societies than in France or Quebec.)

My 1967 monstrous Random House Dictionary lists schlemazel, schlemiel, schlep, schlock, schmaltz, schmooze, schmuck, schnook, schnorrer, schnozzle, schomo, and more, all described as Yiddish words. (Not one of these is in my French dictionary.) When Johnny Carson used to describe his accountant as H & R Goniff, he knew that would get a laugh, and not just from Jews.

The less Yiddish is used with fluency, the more important it becomes as a symbolic reinforcer of Jewish identity for Jews. Yiddish words are used as signs, or as codes. When a Jew uses them when meeting another Jew, it is a way of testing the degree of the tribal bond that can exist. It establishes a level of trust.

The same is true, perhaps more so, for non-Jews. When a non-Jew sprinkles some Yiddishisms into a conversation, or a Jew uses Yiddish words on the assumption they will be understood by non-Jews, barriers fall.

When Simpson used the word "schmozzle" in his text, and the Globe editors used it in the column headline, they accomplished two things. First, they used what appears to be a perfectly apt, expressive word. When it comes to describing the hapless nature of the human condition, Yiddish has no equal.

Second, they perhaps unintentionally sent out a message to Jewish Globe readers that their paper is open to cultural diversity, and is "user-friendly" to Jewish readers. Given the turmoil in the Middle East and the agressive pro-Israel stance being articulated by arch-rival National Post, this subliminal message is important. Jews, like all minority groups, need reassurance from majority groups that they are welcome and understood.

Is a Yiddish revival taking place? The concerts, recordings and festivals dealing with klezmer music and Yiddish culture in general are an important and frankly unanticipated development. They provide Jewish cultural content to many Jews, including the more secular. And certainly there is a steady, perhaps growing, academic interest in Yiddish language and culture, expressed in research studies, books and articles, and university courses.

But this revival should not lead to the assumption that Yiddish will supplant Hebrew as the main Jewish language of cultural expression. It will not. Nor will it become a spoken language among mainstream North American Jews.

Yet the symbolic role remains crucial. Yiddish words for foods are particularly important. Food is an essential element of Jewish identity. Jews, perhaps more than most people, are what they eat, and often what they eat on festive occasions, at least for Ashkenazi Jews, has a Yiddish name. Yiddish terms of endearment and curses, jokes, punchlines and songs also carry a very special baggage.

There is a subtle but important difference between having children call their grandparents bubbie and zayde, or simply grandma and grandpa. When I have grandchildren, I know which term I will prefer.

The Kirshner File

A chronicle of Israel's conflict with the Arabs

Israel's conflict with the Arabs, steeped in acrimonious political and military disputes and exacerbated by irreconcilable religious divisions, is rooted in the savage Russian pogroms which swept across the Pale of Settlement from 1881 onward. These spasms of anti-Semitic violence gave rise to the modern Zionist movement and the first waves of Jewish immigration to Palestine, an Ottoman backwater which American novelist Mark Twain described in 1867 as "a hopeless, dreary, heartbroken land."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

When Jewish settlers from Russia arrived in 1881 as part of the First Aliyah, Arabs constituted about 70 percent of the populace, dispersed in some 700 to 800 hamlets and villages. The Jewish population, mainly Orthodox, poor and dependent on overseas charity, was concentrated in four towns: Jerusalem, Hebron, Safed and Tiberias. The coastal plain, where Tel Aviv would rise from forlorn sand dunes, was largely empty.

Aided by Western philanthropists, the new arrivals, many of whom eventually returned to Russia or headed for the West, bought land and established nearly two dozen settlements from Ness Ziona in the south to Mishmar Ha-Yarden in the north. By 1914, approximately 60,000 Jews lived in Palestine, most having come as tourists or pilgrims.

Their presence was welcomed neither by the Arabs, who feared displacement and dispossession, nor by the Turkish Ottoman authorities, who commiserated with their fellow Muslims and considered the Jews as actual or potential agents of hostile Russian penetration and expansion. Acting on these beliefs, the Ottomans issued a plethora of prohibitions against Jewish tourism, settlement, land purchases and construction. And so, under the worst of conditions, Jews fleeing persecution in Europe settled in Palestine, an enterprise that Benny Morris – a distinguished Israeli historian – describes and analyses in a new and important book, Righteous Victims, A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881-1999 (Alfred A. Knopf).

Morris, a professor at Ben-Gurion University and a fellow at the Hebrew University's Truman Institute, has written a balanced and dispassionate work, a one-stop volume, if you like, which distills the origins and course of a dispute which has yet to be defused.

It's abundantly clear from his narrative that the clash of perceptions rendered peaceful and mutually respectful relations virtually impossible. The Arabs were xenophobic, contemptuous of Jews and suspicious of Jewish intentions. The Jews, though they tried to allay Arab fears, generally regarded their neighbors with condescension. Tensions often stemmed from mutual ignorance of one another's customs and languages, but conflicting interests and goals were ultimately at the source of their problems. As Morris observes, the Arabs were intent on preserving the Arab-Muslim character of the region, while the Jews were determined to change the status quo and transform Palestine into a Jewish homeland.

By his estimation, the first recorded, organized national protest against the Jewish influx took place in 1891, when a group of Arab notables in Jerusalem sent a telegram to the grand vizier in Constantinople asking that the government halt Russian Jewish immigration and bar Jews from buying land. Morris suggests that 1908 was perhaps even a more significant benchmark, the year Arab resistance to Zionist endeavours turned from mostly local to nationwide in nature.

During World War I, the Ottomans, allied with Germany, reimposed restrictions against Jewish settlers in a campaign of mass arrests, forced evacuations and so on. Yet the war also set the stage for an ephemeral alliance between Britain and Zionism, crowned by the1917 Balfour Declaration. Morris, rightly so, suggests that the conflict took on the tone of a zero-sum game when, in 1919, representatives of the Jaffa Muslim-Christian Association declared: "We will push the Zionists into the sea – or they will send us back into the desert."

Arab antagonism to Zionism escalated in the 1920s, sharpened by the doubling of the Jewish population and its land holdings. By 1931, Palestine was home to 175,000 Jews and some 880,000 Arabs. By 1948, which marks the date of the first Arab-Israeli war, the Palestinian Arabs outnumbered the Yishuv by a 2-1 margin.

For that and other reasons, Britain – the colonial power in Mandate Palestine – was certain that the Arab side would prevail in what was seen as an inevitable war. But in fact, the Jews enjoyed a demographic advantage in army-age males, as well as advantages in weaponry, weapons production, morale, organization, literacy and command and control. Still, in the early months of the war, when fighting was dispersed and localized, the Arabs had the edge. When the Haganah switched to the offensive and launched large, sustained operations, Arab formations collapsed, and areas that had been assigned to the Palestinians by the 1947 United Nations partition resolution fell into Jewish hands.

Jewish guardsman, Galilee, 1912. (From Documentors of the Dream)

In surveying the post-war landscape, Morris chronicles the attempts by Israel and its immediate Arab neighbours to reach an accommodation. In 1950, Husni Za'im, the new leader of Syria, offered Israel a peace treaty in return for a redrawing of the border down the middle of the Jordan River and the Sea of Galilee. David Ben-Gurion, the Israeli prime minister, rejected the proposal. In 1950, Israel and Jordan were ready to sign a five-year non-belligerency, but King Abdullah got cold feet and suspended the talks. During this period, Egypt expressed an interest in peace, but only if Israel relinquished much of the Negev Desert. Sniffing at the idea, Ben-Gurion said, "We are ready for peace in exchange for peace."

Morris, at some length, delves into the reprisal policy adopted by Israel in the early 1950s to counter Palestinian Arab terrorist infiltrations. An interesting revelation concerns the Gaza Strip, which, under Egypt's control, posed a particularly vexing challenge to Israeli security. Ben-Gurion, in the mid-1950s, proposed that it be conquered, but he was overruled by the cabinet.

According to Morris, Ben-Gurion overreached himself again at the secret Sèvres conference, called by and Britain and France to plan the 1956 invasion of the Sinai Peninsula. Ben-Gurion, in a grandiose scheme not taken seriously, proposed a wholesale reordering of the Middle East in which Jordan would be dissolved and the West Bank, southern Lebanon and a strip of the eastern Sinai down to Sharm el-Sheikh would be annexed by Israel. He claims that Israel's collusion with the former imperialist powers hardened Arab attitudes and that the destruction of Israel became Arab policy only after 1956. The assertion is only partially correct, since the Arabs were really plotting Israel's demise long before that juncture.

Morris, though, is correct in arguing that Arab rejectionism was partially responsible for the full-blown emergence of a Greater Israel philosophy in certain Israeli circles after 1967. Similarly, his analyses of subsequent events – Israel's complacency on the eve of the Yom Kippur War, the frantic negotiations which asssured the success of the 1978 Camp David summit, and the 1982 war in Lebanon – are quite revealing.

In closing, Morris, a dove, concludes that the succession of Arab-Israeli wars have not only persuaded much of the Arab world of Israel's strength, but forced it to resign itself to the existence of a Jewish state in the heart of the Middle East. Time will tell if he is right.

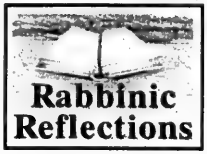
Birth order does not impart status

By RABBI IRWIN E. WITTY



In this week's Torah portion, Vayechi, we read that the time is coming when Israel, that is, our patriarch Jacob, must die. Joseph, his son, comes to see his father, accompanied by his two sons, Menasheh and Ephraim. When Jacob expresses the wish that he wants to bless them, Joseph moves both of them close to their grandfather – Ephraim opposite Jacob's left hand and Menasheh, the older of the two, opposite Jacob's right hand. The right hand, symbolizing the greater blessing, was to be placed on Menasheh's head.

Ignoring what Joseph has done, Jacob stretches out his right hand and places it on the head of Ephraim, the younger son, disregarding the fact that Menasheh is Joseph's first-born. When Joseph attempts to rectify his father's "error," Jacob makes it clear that he has reason for the choice he has made, for it is Ephraim from whom multitudes will emanate and who will be the greater of the two.

Biblical commentators point out that Jacob's action in choosing to give his preferred blessing to Joseph's younger son is but one more example of a phenomenon repeated throughout the Bible, namely, an effort to reject the then-existing practice of granting a unique status to the bechor (first-born), purely by virtue of the accident of birth and without regard to merit.

Rabbi Shlomo Ephraim of Luntchitz (1550-1619), author of the commentary Kli Yakar, contends that in this case, as in others, the Torah attempts to teach us the lesson that Jewish tradition seeks to identify with the one who is lowlier and without the rank imparted to a first-born, rather than with the greater strength, power and trappings which were accorded to the bechor. Although monarchs in most cases succeed their fathers, only because of their having been born first, Judaism wants to underscore a different message. It is not the order in which you were born that mattered; it is who you are.

Thus, while Ishmael is Abraham's first-born, Isaac is chosen to carry on his father's tradition. Esau is Isaac's first-born, yet Jacob inherits the mantle of his father. Reuben is Jacob's first-born, yet Joseph is his chosen one.

Rabbi Samson Rafael Hirsch (1808-1888), in his commentary, extends the analysis of the Kli Yakar. He emphasizes that from the dawn of civilization, the Bible makes an unmistakable effort to show that being born first does not impart special privilege.

Cain is Adam's first-born, but it is Abel who finds favour in God's eyes. In listing the sons of Noah – Shem, Ham and Japhet – the record of who was first-born is obliterated.

Moses is chosen as leader of the Israelites, though he is the youngest of his siblings. In the case of King David, he, the most junior among his brothers, is designated as monarch.

Although the bechorim are chosen initially for service in the Temple, they are replaced by the Levites. Once again, the first-born are downgraded.

The message is clear: there is no inherent superiority that attaches to anyone because of his birth or family status. What determines one's worth is one's morality, one's ethical standards, one's personality and actions. Perhaps, because of the biblical law of primogeniture, the first-born may inherit in double measure a father's material possessions (after all, the first-born did make him into a father). But one's true heirs are those offspring who internalize and reflect clearest of all the spiritual, ethical and moral dimensions of a parent's heritage.

Indeed, when we speak of a heritage instead of an inheritance, one's birth order doesn't really matter.

Witman's death leaves void in Yiddish circles

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

Obituary

WINNIPEG — Noach Witman used to tell a story about the Angel of Death coming to call.

"I told him I'm your customer, and don't worry, you will get me one day," Witman said, "but I can't go right now. I'm too busy."

Unfortunately, Witman could not keep the Angel of Death waiting forever. He died on Dec. 23 at the age of 96, leaving a huge void in Yiddish circles here.

In his eulogy for Witman, Rabbi Peretz Weizman said that Witman had lived long and died young. Although he had been in deteriorating health for some months, Witman was putting out his weekly Yiddish-language column in the Jewish Post and News and hosting his weekly Yiddish-language radio show until three weeks before he died. At the time of his passing, he was also still the executive director for Winnipeg's committee for Yiddish.

The senior Yiddishist had been a resident of Winnipeg since 1927.

Back in Kiev, the then-university student was a committed Labour Zionist whose activities on behalf of the Chalutz Movement got him into trouble with the Communists.

"It was the Jewish Communists who kept arresting me," he recalled in an interview earlier this year. "A sympathetic Jewish attorney-general gave me a choice of going to Siberia or going to Palestine. I naturally chose Palestine."

Fate intervened however. Witman had a sister who brought him to Winnipeg, where the Jewish community then had a thriving Yiddish component. Once he was here, Witman's sister made him promise to help bring over his mother and other family members before making aliyah. Although he did get to Palestine for the first time (but not the last) in 1935, he ended up staying in Winnipeg.

Immediately after he arrived in his new home, Witman threw himself into community work. Throughout the 1940s and early '50s, he served as executive director for the Histadrut for western Canada. He and his first wife Sarah were on the road constantly, visiting the hundreds of large and small communities across the west, collecting money for the Histadrut.

In the mid-'50s, he gave up the Histadrut position to take over the operation of the Yiddishe Wort, Winnipeg's then Yiddish weekly newspaper, a job he held until he retired in 1967.

His career in radio began in the mid-1940s, when he used to buy air time on Sundays to publicize the Histadrut and Jewish affairs.

The first of his regular weekly broadcasts began on Feb. 7, 1954. His show included a mix of interviews with guests, musical recordings and readings by Witman of newspaper stories and poems.

One of his commercial radio sponsors led Witman to another career in the travel business. In return for publicizing a certain travel agency, Witman received a commission for every listener who used the travel agency's services.

In the early 1960s, he opened Witman Travel, and in the 15 years that he was in the travel business, he and his second wife Vera led frequent tours to Israel.

"We used to take tours to Israel four or five times a year," he recalled. "I knew Israel like I know my own fingers."

Witman well remembered his early visits to Israel when speaking Yiddish was considered an aveirah (a sin). He was pleased to note that in recent years Yiddish-speaking groups have sprung up all over Israel.

Last April, he celebrated his 96th birthday in his usual style. He put on a one-man performance at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre for about 160 people, mainly seniors, an event that raised about $700 for the centre. His performance consisted of jokes, songs and poems he himself had written, delivered entirely in Yiddish. Remarkably, he was on his feet for over an hour and he did the whole show from memory.

What's in a name?

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

We will begin to read the second book of the Torah in the next few weeks.

In English, this book is named Exodus since it depicts Israel's exodus from Egypt. However, in Hebrew the book is called Shemot, which means "names."

Traditionally the books of the Torah are called by the first word or words of the text. The second book begins with the phrase, "These are the names" – hence the title of the book. But aside from this seemingly inconsequential way of naming the books, there is a hidden message that reveals not just the names of Israel, but also the status of their well-being.

When we finish reading Genesis, we are told that Joseph has died. Jacob's entire family has been living in Egypt for some time. Yet as we begin the book of Exodus, the text tells us: "These are the names of the children of Israel who came to Egypt with Jacob..." The text then lists the names of Jacob's sons. Why has the text stepped back in time? Certainly we are already aware of the names of Jacob's sons who went to Egypt and settled there.

As the narrative continues, we are told that a new Pharaoh has arisen in Egypt who did not know Joseph. Biblical commentary has asked about and tried to address this strange statement. If Joseph was the second in command in Egypt, a man of significant office, how could a new Pharaoh not be aware of him? The midrash and commentaries offer many complex possible explanations.

Immediately following is the description of the enslavement of the Israelites and the birth of Moses.

What is most interesting in the narrative surrounding the birth of Moses is that no one involved in this story is referred to by name. Moses' parents are identified as a man from Levi and a daughter of Levi. Miriam is referred to as the sister. Moses' adopted mother is referred to as Pharaoh's daughter. The absence of any names is quite striking to the reader and gets resolved only when Moses is named.

The text is thus drawing a line for the reader from the beginning of the book to the birth of Moses. It does not list the names of Jacob's sons in order to review the information, but in order to make a statement about them. Names are synonymous with identities.

We have been told in the first phrases of the book that when Jacob's children went to Egypt they were clear in their identities. But by the time Israel is enslaved there are no names – there is no clear sense of identity.

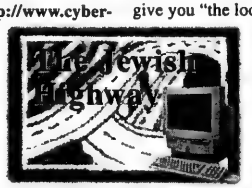
How did the Israelites get this way? The key is in the phrase connected with Joseph.

Although we know Joseph by his Hebrew name, Genesis told us that Pharaoh had renamed Joseph with an Egyptian name. I believe the new Pharaoh did know Joseph but knew him by his Egyptian name. In other words, Joseph's name introduces the dual identity that reflects a Jewish existence in exile. Joseph has a Hebrew name and an Egyptian one – a Hebrew identity and an Egyptian one. Joseph is the turning point. He went to Egypt with a clear sense of identity, and we watch as an element of confusion is introduced that ultimately results in a lack of names – a lost identity.

When Moses is born and subsequently named, the Torah tells us that this individual will resolve the issue. Moses will bring the Torah to the Jews, and it is that document that will cement our identity for all time.

Gefilte fish – part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ



Today we continue sampling the best Internet sites for that quintessential Jewish food – gefilte fish.

An excellent assortment of gefilte fish recipes can be found at the RCFJ Recipe Archives [ht tp://www.cyberkitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=FISH].

There are over a dozen suggestions, and if you're tired of the classics, you can try your hand at Leslie's Mexican Gefilte Fish, Marian Burros's Gefilte Fish Loaf and Maryland Spicy Gefilte Fish. And for something a bit different, there's Alaskan Halibut and Salmon Gefilte Fish Terrine. There's even a recipe for Chrain, the perfect complement to gefilte fish, which calls for horseradish root, sugar, vinegar and mustard. Over at Arielle's Recipe Archives there are five variations, including Beet Gefilte Fish Mould [http://recipes.alastra.com/fish/].

Not everybody has the time or energy to cook up a batch of gefilte fish from scratch. So there are quite a few online recipes that will tell you how to transform bottled fish into something with an added home taste.

I particularly like the recipe at Torahbytes because it advises you to buy "one large jar gefilte fish; good brand – even if not on sale." The secret of this recipe is adding your own beets, carrots, onions and seasonings to the fish. Bring it all to a boil. Turn down and simmer for 45 minutes [http://www.torahbytes.org/sechel/Gefilte.htm]. Another popular time saver is using the frozen loaf of fish, which according to its recipe, will give you "the look and taste of homemade." [http://www.kosherquest.org/html/Gafilta_Fish.htm].

And here's a suggestion for people who just love the idea of eating gefilte fish: Vegetarian Gefilte Fish [http://www.ras kinfish.com/recipes.htm]. The recipe calls for eggs, onions, carrots, potato and matzah meal, but not a speck of pike.

Oddly, the ZenWeb Gefilte Fish page has no recipes, but it does have gorgeous pictures which show all the steps involved in preparing a traditional platter [http://www.zenreich.com/ZenWeb/gefilte.htm]. Over at the Temple Beth David site in Cheshire, Conn., you can watch "Fred's Aunt Sylvia and Fred's mother Dorothy" lovingly grind their fish, add seasonings, roll the balls and pose surrounded by "80 pieces of delicious gefilte fish." [http://www.uahc.org/ct/tbd/tbdpasso.html].

Any good cook will tell you the secret to gefilte fish is finding just the right balance between ground fish such as pike, carp and, of course, whitefish. But Scott Gilbert has accomplished something few others can claim. The intrepid scientist at Swarthmore College's Society for Developmental Biology has actually photographed a "gefilte fish embryo" [http://sdb.bio.purdue.edu/SDBEduca/Gefilte.html]. According to Gilbert, the picture on his Web site "is a chimeric pike and whitefish blastula which should (if all goes well) develop into a mature gefilte. We are constructing fate maps using horseradish peroxidase."

It's a bit early to think about Rosh Hashanah cards, but if you want to be prepared, you can order one with a gefilte fish motif [http://anothercreation.com/gefilte_fish__165.html]. There's a lovely mixed media collage illustrating a traditional piece of fish along with fish recipes inside the card. The inscription: "Best wishes for a New Year filled with all of the ingredients for good health, happiness and peace." (It is signed, "The Fischman Family.")

Last year, the Israeli post office probably did more to get gefilte fish into the mouths of thousands of people than a generation of bubbies. It immortalized the food on a postage stamp [http://www.israelphilately.org.il/English/NewIssues/2000/isrfood.htm].

Along with stamps honouring other classics like falafel and couscous, the gefilte fish stamp depicts five pieces of fish crowned with carrot slices.

Liberal scare tactics distracted voters

By JOHN T. SYRTASH

Based on the margin of victory in several ridings with substantial Jewish populations, it appears most Jews continued to vote Liberal in the last federal election. However, many voted Liberal reluctantly while some voted for other parties.

Most importantly, many Jews did not vote at all. In fact, only about 57.5 percent of all those eligible voted, Jewish or not, one of the lowest voter turnouts ever.

In the west, most Jews voted for the Canadian Alliance. MPs Irwin Cotler in Montreal and Joe Volpe in Toronto received solid Jewish support, but both MPs opposed their own government on recent United Nations votes concerning Israel.

Prior to the election, Canada's anti-Israel votes at the UN sparked grass-roots anger in the Jewish community. Government indifference to the funding of religious schools in Ontario was also a sore spot. By contrast, the Alliance supported a balanced approach to Israel at the UN while proposing tax credits for religious day school tuition.

The Alliance was ill prepared in central and eastern Canada and Prime Minister Chrétien capitalized on the party's inexperience by shrewdly calling a snap election during good economic times. The Alliance was also hampered by its positions on some key issues: a fuzzy policy on referendums; leader Stockwell Day's opposition to current gun control laws; a decentralized view of Canada. These positions were not popular with many central and eastern Jewish voters. In addition, many Jews backed Chrétien on the Clarity Bill (though most did not realize the Alliance supported its passage).

Fair enough. But what about Jewish concerns over Israel and fair funding for day schools?

Scare tactics distracted the Jewish community during the campaign, particularly the frequent association of the Alliance with extremist elements.

Columnist Dalton Camp, a Tory insider, and a Jewish lawyer, both writing in the Toronto Star claimed that lawyer Doug Christie, whose clients include notorious Holocaust deniers, had successfully joined the Alliance. In reality Christie was turfed once Day learned he had joined the party.

Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region, slammed Day for failing to ask Doug Christie to cancel a pro-Day rally, implying without any proof that Day had control over Christie's activities.

Meanwhile, in Calgary Northeast, Liberal candidate Hakim Faqiryar campaigned for the "Death of Israel." Faqiryar later resigned, yet Congress and others were notably silent when the Liberal party subsequently honoured Faqiryar with the job of a campaign manager!

In Thornhill, home to many Jews, Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan sensed her vulnerability on the issue of Israel. She announced that supporters of the Alliance were bigots, racists and Holocaust deniers. B'nai Brith criticized Caplan's statements, but in its attempt to appear "even handed," its press release was ineffective.

Around the same time, a CBC TV documentary implied that Day's religious beliefs would turn Canada into a fundamentalist Christian theocracy. Ironically, some Jewish voters were convinced that any leader who believes God created the world in seven days must be dangerous.

The attacks continued. Joey Slinger of the Toronto Star suggested that Nazi murderer Heinrich Himmler would have voted for the Alliance. Slinger also falsely associated Day with Holocaust deniers James Keegstra and Ernst Zundel. A mid-election speech by Chrétien on the dark forces of fascism was understood as an allusion to the Alliance.

Guilt by association was effectively employed to isolate Day.

Not one official from Congress protested, yet shortly after the election, Keith Landy of Congress quickly and rightly pounced on a Toronto school trustee for using similar exaggerated language that cheapened the Holocaust.

It is no surprise that many central and eastern Jews felt they had no alternative but to vote Liberal. Others voted for the Conservatives, most of them not realizing that Joe Clark supported the UN resolution condemning Israel.

Nevertheless, the Alliance's support east of Saskatchewan grew dramatically, placing second in several Jewish ridings, albeit a distant second. Given the vitriol, even this was a miracle.

Had the Alliance been perceived as a strong centrist party with national scope, these scare tactics may not have worked. But the perception was the opposite. As a result, most Jewish voters in central and eastern Canada tended to opt for the "devil they knew" and voted Liberal, if they voted at all.

Chrétien did achieve a plurality. But Trudeaumania this was not.

John Syrtash is a family law lawyer in Toronto.

Understanding the Jewish vote

Alliance couldn't break historic ties to Grits

By SENATOR JERRY S. GRAFSTEIN

For the second time in just over 20 years, a question about Israel and the Jewish voter erupted in the media in the midst of a federal election – with mixed results.

In the 1979 election, Conservative leader Joe Clark attempted to reverse the Liberal government's policy of maintaining its Israel embassy in Tel Aviv. Clark's surprise mid-election pledge, to move the embassy to Jerusalem, was viewed with some skepticism.

Advisors, especially in Toronto, apparently convinced Clark that this promise could make political inroads among Jewish voters in key, hotly contested Toronto ridings such as St. Paul's. In that close 1979 election, St. Paul's voted Tory and was a key to the short-lived Clark minority government. It seemed Clark was able to widen the bridge to the Jewish community laboriously built by the Conservative prime minister, John Diefenbaker, who was seen as a staunch defender of Israel. This, coupled with Diefenbaker's lifelong support for human rights, minorities and immigrants, enabled the Conservatives to gain strong support in the Jewish community. Brian Mulroney shared Diefenbaker's visceral support for the State of Israel, which assisted him in his sweeping electoral triumphs in some Ontario ridings with substantive Jewish voting bases.

Stockwell Day's support for Israel erupted suddenly in the last federal election, following Canada's vote for a lopsided UN resolution that condemned Israel's use of force, without referring to Palestinian violence. Turbulence among Jewish voters who traditionally awarded Liberals with larger than average voter turnouts unsettled even Liberal MPs, as they felt the ferocity of frustration at the door and at public meetings.

Day and his advisors sensed this voter unease. Seeking an electoral breakthrough for the Alliance in Ontario, the party immediately condemned Canada's position as unbalanced and unfair. It is still not clear whether Day's views on Israel were electorally opportunistic or rooted in deeper Pentecostal beliefs about the biblical sanctity of Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem. It was clear the Alliance was making a determined effort to gather credibility among Jewish voters, especially Orthodox Jews, who had been lobbying for public funding for Jewish day schools on the same basis claimed for Catholic separate schools.

Clearly Day was attempting to distance the Alliance from the Reform party, which had been tainted by outspoken members and supporters who were seen as inimical to "Jewish" issues ranging from Holocaust revisionism to immigration. The Alliance was now represented by a fresh crop of multicultural candidates. What was also new was large turnouts at Alliance public meetings of Orthodox Jews who supported the Alliance's electoral efforts.

Pressure from Liberal members led Jean Chrétien to meet with Jewish communal leaders and to issue an open letter identifying with Jewish frustration at the UN resolution. Liberal ministers, first Elinor Caplan in Toronto and then Hedy Fry in Vancouver, openly accused the Alliance of harbouring bigoted supporters. To be fair, no party is free of bigoted adherents.

But the vigorous attempts by the Alliance to decouple traditional Jewish support from the Liberal party required more work and more history. What is clear is that Jewish support for Liberalism stretches back to 1840s England when Liberals were active in supporting Jewish membership in the House of Commons. Allegiance to the Liberal party in Canada in the 1920s and '30s was closely related to this, as was subsequent English history. Meanwhile, the Liberals' postwar identification with social policies such as immigration and health care invigorated its support among Jews.

Jewish support for the Liberals intensified in the Trudeau years, essentially based on his policies of immigration, multiculturalism, the Charter of Rights and support for individual rights in a united Canada. Jean Chrétien added fiscal responsibility and gun control as key policies.

What is not yet clear is what predominately carried the Liberals to their recent electoral majority. Was it the Liberal leader, the party's social policies, the economy or a wedge of gender issues like "choice" on abortion? Or, was it fear of the unknown, untested leadership of Stockwell Day? In ridings with sizeable Jewish populations, Liberals won strong majorities, with, however, historically low turnouts. Despite volatility in support for the Liberal party, in the end, the older pattern of support for liberal social policies and sound fiscal measures returned.

To isolate the Jewish vote requires rigorous statistical calculations. More often it is a contested electoral commodity that follows mainstream thinking. Yet this election may mark a maturity amongst certain Jewish voters who are prepared to organize, cluster and follow their defined interests more transparently, and allow parties to vie for their support in future elections.

Nightclub fundraiser helps abused kids in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The younger generation – with an interest, in part, sparked by Birthright Israel trips — has taken on the leadership of a local organization that benefits abused children in Israel, and is planning a January 18 fundraiser at a downtown nightclub.

The new executive of ELI, The Canada-Israel Association for Child Protection is headed by 23-year-old president Sari Goldman, whose mother, Fran, established the group here in 1994 after learning about ELI, an Israeli non-profit organization that helps Jewish and Arab children suffering from neglect and physical, emotional and sexual abuse.

Sari Goldman, who is the outreach and program supervisor at the Canada-Israel Experience Centre here, said the current ELI project is not "Birthright-focused, but the people working on it are all past participants or past staff. We thought it was a great way for all of us to maintain touch with each other and with Israel...This is just a little area, but it's a very important area."

She left Toronto Dec. 31 to lead her third Birthright trip, the 10-day free trip for young Jewish adults age 18 to 26, and planned to visit ELI's offices while in Israel.

Becoming involved in ELI here was "a good opportunity to start giving back," said Mark Silver, vice-president, financial. A 26-year-old entrepreneur who is launching his own Internet event-planning service, Silver took part in a Birthright trip last May.

"I love the enthusiasm, energy and creative thinking of this [new] young group," said Fran Goldman, whose original "junior board" of late 20-somethings to those in their early 40s have been running children's concerts, sending local inner city kids to be entertained and raising money for ELI at the same time.

Recently, however, the volunteers, because of their stage in life, have been "overwhelmed by work and children," she said. "We are happy to let [the new board] take the lead and then help out in whatever capacity we can."

The benefit party, geared to 22- to 27-year-olds (post-undergraduates), will feature a deejay, a raffle and a free drink per person before 11 p.m. It will be held at Society Night Club, 137 Peter Street, at 9 p.m. Tickets are $10 in advance, $15 at the door.

For tickets contact Goldman at 416-398-6931 ext. 3, or Shayna Allen at 416-785-1465, ext. 6611.

Author recalls deportation of the Jews of Baden

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Being in Germany recently to read selections from her partly autobiographical novel, Bye-Bye, Baden-Baden, reminded Lucille de Saint-Andre of her experience as a 16-year-old deported by the Nazis.

The author was at the Insel Theatre in Karlsruhe, Germany, taking part in a commemoration of the 60th anniversary of the mass deportation of the Jews of Baden, and the Palatinate and Saar regions of Germany to Camp de Gurs in Vichy, France.

Bye-Bye, Baden-Baden tells the story of Uschi, a Jewish teenager who tries to make sense of the world during the Holocaust.

Lucille de Saint-Andre

Following the reading, the guests at the memorial service were "interested and fascinated with my story," and asked about her recollections, and about her and her family, Saint-Andre said in an interview.

"The reading and interest there gave me a feeling of closure," she said. She recalled the internment of her family and their miraculous departure, adding, "The reading completes the cycle for me."

She and her husband also took part in a commemorative journey with several hundred people to Camp de Gurs in the French Pyrenees, where she and her family had been deported.

"It was so long ago, it didn't feel real," she said.

Camp de Gurs, near the border with Spain, was built by the Spaniards who escaped the Civil War by crossing the Pyrenees to France in the late 1930s. Many were still there when the Jews arrived. Some left for South America and others for Mexico. The Republican Spaniards could not return to Spain, as they would have been jailed.

Today, there is a large, empty field where rows of barracks once stood and 6,500 Jews were interned.

More than 1,000 died of dysentery and malnutrition, some got away and two-thirds were shipped to Auschwitz.

Those attending a memorial service at the Gurs cemetery included Saint-Andre and six other survivors, two German ministers, French veterans of the resistance, seven mayors of Badische cities, French mayors from the surrounding area, Jean Kahn, president of the Central Council of the Jews of France and the chief rabbi of Paris.

Born Liselotte Blum in Tauberbischofsheim, Germany, Saint-Andre and her family moved to Karlsruhe, where her father owned a successful wholesale porcelain business. Just prior to the war, her father was forced to sell the business to a Nazi. On Oct. 22, 1940, the Jewish population of the town was deported to Camp de Gurs.

The family managed to get out of the camp and went to Marseilles, where for six months they desperately tried to obtain visas for the family.

"Miraculously, we did get a visa and left for the United States in August 1941," Saint-Andre said.

They boarded a ship to New York after a two-month wait. Their vessel was dubbed "the ship from hell" by the press because of the horrific conditions and because their six-week voyage took them to several ports.

In New York, Saint-Andre went to high school. She moved to Montreal in the '50s and was the first female police reporter for the Montreal Star. Returning to New York, she polished her writing skills at New York University and later assisted Nobel Prize-winner Isaac Bashevis Singer with his translations.

During the 1968 student uprising in Mexico City, she worked for the Mexican Olympic Committee doing public relations. She said she left New York in 1984 "because I love Canada and wanted to return here."

Saint-Andre currently lives in the Annex area with her husband, Robert Sandbo, a retired film editor/cinematographer who won an Emmy for the four-hour feature, FDR.

Saint-Andre said she is writing a second novel about Uschi in America and she is also preparing a book of short stories of eccentric women she knows in New York.

From left, Barbara and Elliott Rothman, and Marcia Talmage take a break from their work at an old Jewish cemetery in Suriname. Elliott is wearing gloves to protect his hands from flour used to dust the stones and throw the letters into relief. Inset, a stone bears the carving of a tree chopped down by an axe, symbolizing a person who died too young.

Elderhostel group catalogues old South American gravestones

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It might not be what some people would consider a holiday, working for most of the morning and again in late afternoon in the tropical heat.

But for Barbara and Elliott Rothman of Toronto, and 10 American travellers, a one-week Elderhostel trip to Suriname over Sukkot proved to be a fascinating and meaningful adventure.

Their project, under the auspices of Caribbean Volunteer Expeditions, involved cataloguing graves in the old Ashkenazi cemetery in Paramaribo, the small South American country's capital. The cemetery – with about 350 stones and more than 500 graves – was in use from 1700 to 1883.

"You really felt [the inscriptions] were speaking to you," said Barbara, 53, a social worker with the Kidney Foundation. "Some went into great detail about the person's life."

The gravestone of Naftali Jacob, a childless sugar plantation owner who died at age 80, bore carved hands positioned for a priestly blessing, denoting his status as a Cohen, and a mention of his providing financially for Paramaribo's Neve Shalom Congregation.

Barbara also learned that in his will, Jacob left money to Jews of his native Vilna, prompting some of them to adopt the surname Surinam (as it was spelled originally) or Zurinam. "I thought that was very interesting, very unusual," said Barbara.

A chartered accountant by profession, Elliott, 55, had seen the trip listed in an Elderhostel catalogue and said to his wife, "Hey, let's go!" To reach their destination, six degrees north of the equator, they took three planes, changing in Miami and again in Curaçao.

While in Suriname, a territory of the Netherlands until it declared independence in 1975, they also journeyed by boat to see synagogue and Jewish cemetery ruins in Jodensavanne (Jewish Savannah). The 350-year-old village was founded by 500 Jews, who ran 200 sugar cane plantations with the help of 9,000 slaves. The plantation owners, originally from Recife, Brazil (then a Portuguese colony under the Inquisition), had been invited to settle in what was then Dutch Guiana.

A visit to Neve Shalom – an attractive, well-kept 1835 synagogue with a sand floor – was sad, said Elliott, because there was no minyan on Simchat Torah. "Even with us," added Barbara.

Members of the Suriname Jewish community, numbering about 200, begged for assistance finding a Hebrew teacher, even on a short-term basis, or someone to run a seder or High Holy Day service. Ideally, they need someone who speaks Dutch, although Afrikaans is probably close enough, said the Rothmans.

At the cemetery, Barbara, as one of only three people who could read Hebrew, helped transcribe and translate the Hebrew inscriptions. A native of Montreal, as is her husband, Barbara attended the precursor of the Solomon Schechter Academy until age 13. "I could read the letters and the easy words."

New Yorker Marcia Talmage, a former Hebrew teacher and the widow of Frank Talmage, founder of the University of Toronto's Jewish Studies program, had the best knowledge of Hebrew, which was especially useful distinguishing words that didn't have spaces between them.

She told The CJN in a brief phone interview she felt the project was "avodat kodesh" (holy work) that combined her passion for Judaism and adventure. For nights after, Talmage would see Hebrew letters in front of her eyes when she went to sleep at night.

Elliott and the rest of the non-Hebrew-literate participants transcribed the Dutch and Portuguese inscriptions, and sprinkled flour over the flat gravestones to enhance the contrast between the carved letters and their backgrounds.

Many of the stones – all European imports – had symbolic carvings. "A lot have a tree cut off before its time, with an axe," said Elliott. One even had a skull and crossbones, symbolizing the deceased's readiness to rise from the dead when Mashiach arrives. Another had an open box, a knife and a clamp, tools of a mohel.

The Rothmans – who had previously travelled to Nepal with Elderhostel, which runs educational programs for adults 55 and older – said the cemetery project was about 80 percent completed by the end of their stay.

The project was initiated about two years ago by Adriana Van Alen, who is married to a Jewish plantation owner. Van Alen herself rescued stones buried in sewer water, said Barbara, noting that the cemetery had been in poor condition and part of it was under water at one point.

The volunteers served as a vehicle to record the cemetery's information for posterity, said Talmage.

Obituary Fields was a war hero

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — John Fields, who was honoured by the Polish government for his bravery as a patriot during the Warsaw Ghetto uprising and for his heroic activities in the Polish Home Army during the Polish uprising in 1944, died recently of heart disease. He was 77.

The quiet-spoken, gentle man was an underground fighter proficient with guns and grenades and was involved in acts of sabotage against the Nazis.

Fields was born in Warsaw. His father, Avraham Feldberg, died when he was two. In 1942, he and his mother were moved with the other Jews to the Warsaw Ghetto.

He was always hesitant to speak of his heroic actions in the ghetto during the 27 days that the Jews resisted the Nazis.

Andd he rarely spoke of his near-death escape into the sewer system, his falsified documents and disguise as a Polish underground fighter, his saving the life of his Polish colleague in the underground, his capture by the Germans or his experiences as a Polish prisoner of war.

Following his liberation in 1945, Fields went to Bergen-Belsen to look for his family, but found most of them had perished. At the camp, he met Dorothy Weber, a young survivor. They were married at Bergen-Belsen.

The couple came to Canada in 1948. For 35 years, Fields owned and operated Royal Style Sportswear.

He became active at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation.

In June 1997, in an interview with The CJN, Fields said that despite his ugly memories that haunted him, he was grateful to have survived. "Thank God that I have a wonderful family – good children who are educated and very caring to us."

An active member of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada, he was described by Louis Vandelman, executive director of the Veterans organization, as "a very valued member whose advice we sought. He was always there for us."

Fields is survived by his wife Dorothy, children Lally Gould, Louis, Harvey and Steven, and nine grandchildren.

Royal College's new president is a doctor of many 'firsts'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bernard Langer, the new president of The Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada, was the first doctor in Toronto to perform a successful liver transplant.

Langer, a general surgeon at The Toronto General Hospital, has two other "firsts" to his credit.

In 1963, he was the first Jew to be appointed to a full-time position on The Toronto General Hospital's surgery staff.

In 1983, as chair of the department of surgery at the University of Toronto, he developed the first formal training program in Canada for young surgeons headed for an academic career in medicine.

It became the model for the Royal College's much-lauded Clinician Investigator Program.

Langer, 68, will serve a two-year term at the college, based in Ottawa.

It defines educational requirements and sets training standards in 56 medical surgical specialties.

And through a special program, it helps its 32,000 members (fellows) in Canada and elsewhere maintain their specialty competence.

Langer, whose clinical and research interests have focused mainly on diseases of the liver, biliary tract and pancreas, is chair of the council that sets policy for the college.

He expects to spend about 40 percent of his time on college business once he settles into the job. His appointment was announced in September.

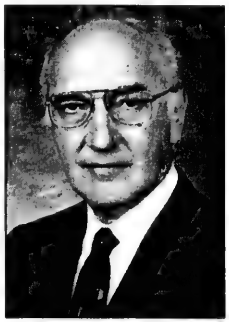
His parents Joel and Pearl, came to Canada from Poland in 1911. Joel was a tailor. Pearl, a homemaker, bore six children. Langer was the youngest.

At Harbord Collegiate, he excelled in mathematics and science. He decided to be a doctor when he was in Grade 13.

Langer thought that medicine would enable him to fuse his interest in science with his enjoyment of working with people.

He was a counsellor at two summer camps, Camp Fundale and Camp Tamarack.

In 1956, he graduated from the Unversity of Toronto, the gold medalist in his class. He completed his post-graduate surgical training at the U of T, M.D. Anderson Hospital in Houston, Tex., and the Peter Bent Brigham Hospital in Boston, Mass.



Dr. Bernard Langer

His appointment at The Toronto General Hospital signalled a significant change in its policy.

"It had been a place where Jews couldn't get work," he said.

Langer also believes that the city was in flux.

"Toronto had evolved from a fairly homgeneous society before World War II to a fairly cosmopolitan society after the war," he added. "Everything was opening up, and there were just too many good people of different backgrounds who could no longer be ignored."

Langer explained that new surgical techniques and drugs, as well as an infusion of greater government funding, set the stage for the first liver transplant he performed in Toronto.

In fact, the first successful liver transplant procedure took place in the United States in 1967. Until the late 1970s, these procedures were considered experimental and thus risky.

Today, an average of 90 such transplants are done annually at The Toronto General Hospital.

After developing the hepatobiliary and pancreatic surgery unit at the hospital, he established the liver transplantation program at the U of T, where he was chair of the department of surgery from 1982 to 1992.

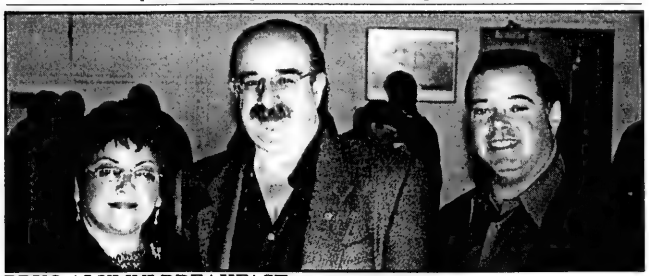
During his chairmanship, he set up the U of T's innovative surgical-scientist training program, designed for medical students interested in research and in teaching medicine.

"The program set a very high standard and attracted very good people who have gone on to successful university careers."

Still a professor of surgery, Langer said that he has gained enormous professional satisfaction from having trained a corps of accomplished and respected surgeons and academics.

An avid fisherman and an enthusiastic golfer, Langer and his wife Ryna, a retired librarian, have four children. Jacob is head of general surgery at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, David is a bond trader in New York, Pearl is a family physician in London, Ont., and Michael is a computer scientist at McGill University.

A former board member of Holy Blossom Temple, Langer and his wife have 10 grandchildren.



BBYO ALUMNI BREAKFAST: The first BBYO Lake Ontario Region alumni breakfast series was recently held in Toronto. Celebrating the 45th anniversary of Chapter Lorac AZA #995, the featured speaker was Lorac alumnus, Harvey Atkin (centre). Seen with Atkin is Helen Wander Gold, alumni chair, and Jeff Wagman, BBYO board chair.

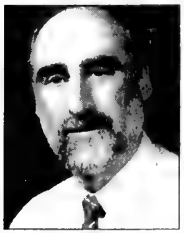
Canadian architecture credited for unique designs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – Harold Kalman, a Vancouver-based architectural historian and heritage consultant, claims in a new book that Canadian architecture is unique.

"It's unique in that we shaped things as no other nations did," says the author of A Concise History of Canadian Architecture (Oxford University Press, 2000).

"We may have begun with many of the same models as architects (in Europe and Asia), but Canada's particular social, cultural and environmental conditions produced something different. Sometimes, the differences are subtle, but they are always there."



Harold Kalman

Kalman, who established Canada's first private heritage conservation practice in 1975, believes that architecture is "an expression of a country's history, social and cultural aspirations and environmental opportunities and constraints."

As a result, he says, something "uniquely Canadian" has emerged from the drawingboards of Canada's architects.

Kalman's book is a condensed and updated version of his original two-volume treatise, A History of Canadian Architecture (1994). Nevertheless, at 661 pages, it is still hefty, comprehensive and erudite.

A former academic whose 94-year-old father Maxwell is a retired architect, Kalman takes the reader on a fascinating journey from the first buildings in the country to Canada's architectural future.

As well, Kalman offers a history and critique of several synagogue buildings, ranging from Montreal's Shaar Hashomayim (where he studied Hebrew and prayed as a youth) to Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple.

"Holy Blossom should be appreciated as a national landmark of inter-war experiments with balancing traditionalism and modernism," he says.

"By contrast, the little shul in Edenbridge, Saskatoon, is utterly humble and remarkably charming, a testament to the dedication of its Jewish pioneers.

"Shaar Hashomayim is superbly impressive, though the exterior was severely damaged by 1960s alterations."

Raised in Montreal's Snowdon district, Kalman, known as Hal to friends and acquaintances, graduated from Westmount High School in 1960 and studied art, archeology and architectural history at Princeton University.

From 1968 to 1975,while teaching in the department of fine arts at the University of British Columbia, he became involved in the conservation of historic buildings.

Two years after taking a course in preservation at Cornell University, he left his job at UBC.

"I loved teaching and working with students, but I was bored, didn't like academic administration, and saw more interesting challenges elsewhere," Kalman says.

He and partner John Stewart formed Commonwealth Historic Resource Management Ltd., which has undertaken conservation projects in Canada and abroad, including the restoration of the Rideau Street Chapel of Ottawa's National Gallery of Canada, the design of heritage conservation plans for Kingston, Ontario, and Kelowna, B.C., the rehabilitation of a neighbourhood in Qingdao, China, a coastal city that was once a German colony, and the drafting of a tourist development scheme for the Caribbean islands of Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago.

Kalman decided to write A History of Canadian Architecture after reading Alan Gowans' classic 1958 study, Looking at Architecture in Canada, revised in 1966 as Building Canada.

"It turned me on to Canadian architectural history," Kalman says.

"While Building Canada was groundbreaking – the first attempt at a national history of architecture – it also had many weaknesses. I resolved to write my own history of Canadian architecture.

"By the time I got to it, there was a very strong foundation of research on individual buildings, architects and styles, so all I had to do was to absorb it, organize it into a meaningful framework, and step back and assess it."

Supported by a grant from the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada, Kalman spent about 12 years researching and writing what is now A Concise History of Canadian Architecture.

CHAT awarded grant

TORONTO — Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) is entering its second year as a recipient of an Avi-Chai Bookshelf Grant.

Avi-Chai has also given a grant to CHAT's new campus at Richmond Hill.

The Avi-Chai Foundation, a New York-based private foundation dedicated to supporting and encouraging the growing Jewish day school movement, developed Avi-Chai Bookshelf – a two-year, $1 million pilot program – in an effort to enhance libraries at Jewish high schools in the United States and Canada.

"We are delighted to have been selected for the Avi-Chai Bookshelf grant. Through this grant, our library will be better equipped to effectively serve both our teachers and students, helping to enrich the classroom curriculum and develop the research skills of our students," said Paul Shaviv, headmaster of CHAT.

CHAT received $10,000 (US) over two years for the purchase of materials (books, audiovisual items and software) for their media centres. According to the guidelines of the grant, at least half of the money is being used toward Judaic materials. The school put together a committee of teachers and administrators from different disciplines to make the purchases.

Rabbi's assistant found commitment through job

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Tanya Blumenthal, assistant to Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple, says working at the temple has opened the door to her commitment to the Jewish community.

Blumenthal, who was brought up in a traditional home in South Africa – the Conservative and Reform movements are quite small there – says when she arrived in Canada in 1986, she and her husband, now the parents of two daughters, had difficulty becoming affiliated.

"When I came to the temple 7½ years ago, however, I was the life cycle co-ordinator, and I became very involved with the members.

"It's a pivotal position in the congregation because so much of people's lives revolves around life cycles. I was involved in all the important events of their lives, and I learned a lot about them and about Reform Judaism. The work was very enriching."

As she got involved in her work, she says, her family became "regular shul-goers, and we were introduced to a community of people that has become very important to us. Although we have since moved to Thornhill, Holy Blossom is home to us, and we are still regular members. It just feels right."

She changed jobs about one year ago, she says, because she needed a change. "I was on call on all the off hours, and as much as I loved the work, I needed more time for my family.

"I told [Rabbi Moscowitz] that I was feeling a little burned out, and we agreed that becoming his assistant could work out well."

Her current job, she says, is directed by the rabbi's needs and responsibilities. "As we work together, we are getting to know one another well. It is helpful to him that I am his front person. I plan meetings, take phone calls, type sermons and eulogies, co-ordinate his schedule, and often act as a secretary; it depends on the day."

Tanya Blumenthal

After the hectic pace of her first job, she says, Rabbi Moscowitz was concerned that this position might not be busy enough for her.

"I have a lot of people contact, though, and that is very important to me. I still feel a strong connection to the congregation. It is helpful that I did the other job because when people call in, they know me. I am not a stranger, and that is a benefit for him, for me, and for the congregation.

"I knew, even before I started this job, that I would enjoy working for Rabbi Moscowitz. He is very fair, and I can talk to him easily. There has been some pressure, but it is a challenging position; it is not just a job.

"I feel like I am doing something for a greater purpose, and that is what makes my work stimulating."

NCSY director inducted into Ben Zakkai Honour Society

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Glenn Black, director of National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), Canada region, was inducted into the Orthodox Union's Ben Zakkai Honour Society last month in New York.

NCSY is the youth arm of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations.

The Ben Zakkai Honour Society was established in 1965 to honour those men and women who "have demonstrated personal Torah growth and the promise of future meaningful service to the Jewish people and the Orthodox community," according to a media release from the Orthodox Union.

Rabbi Black told The CJN that he has no idea who nominated him, why they did it, and why he won the honour. He did allow that it might have had something to do with the growth of NCSY in Toronto from a small storefront operation in the Bathurst Street-Wilson Avenue area to a thriving 7,000 sq. foot premises in the Main Exchange Plaza at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue, that serves some 1,500 youngsters.

There are now chapters at Shaarei Shomayim, Kehillat Shaarei Torah and Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogues in Toronto, as well as others in such places as London, Kitchener, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, Calgary, Vancouver and Winnipeg.

The Montreal-born Rabbi Black received smichah (rabbinic ordination) from the late Rabbi Pinchas Hirschsprung of Montreal. He has been at NCSY in Toronto for 10 years.

The mandate of NCSY, he said, is "to maximize Jewish commitment and religious observance through various social, educational and recreational programs."

What makes that statement most meaningful to him, he said, is that it was written not by him but by organization members and staff.

While the focus of NCSY is on high school students, there are also programs for students from grades 6 to 8, and a new program for those of university age, who he describes as "NCSY alumni. Even after spending a year in Israel or starting university, they need a connection to their Jewish roots."

The goal of the organization is not necessarily to make kids religious, he pointed out – it's to make them Jewishly committed. "It stands for Jewish education on all levels, from the most basic to advanced."

Junior NCSY arranges three to four Shabbatons a year, a Thursday night drop-in centre where participants can enjoy computers, games and movies, and a social or religious program once a month, such as a sukkah party, bowling, or laser tag.

Some 30 groups have grown up in university settings, most at York University and University of Toronto, with different learning programs and their own plans.

The stress, however, is on high school students. "These are the kids who are making difficult decisions about their lives. We want to be here to help them," Rabbi Black said.

There are 15 Shabbatons a year, a drop-in centre, Torah High (formerly called Free Torah High, which is still free, by the way), one-on-one learning, Jewish Culture Clubs, that offer Jewish programming in local public high schools, and a yearly trip to Washington during spring break.

"It is pure Jewish energy," Rabbi Black said. "In the real Jewish world, the excitement of being a Jew burns out sometimes. Here, you get to experience it again [as if it was] the first time."

Connection between national identity, architecture explored

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Shelley Hornstein chronicles the historic connection between national identity and architecture. Or, to put it differently, she studies the way in which architecture captures and distills memory.

"We identify ourselves by our surroundings, our family, friends, communities, cities and spaces," explained Hornstein, a professor of fine arts and architectural history at York University.

"All of this contributes to formulating our personal and collective sense of self."

Born in Montreal, a multilingual city known for its ethnic diversity, Hornstein has pursued her interests in this somewhat unusual field by focusing on Canada and France. She has explored the nature of urban space in 19th-century Montreal, where she taught at Concordia University. She has also examined architectural tendencies in Strasbourg, France, where she earned a PhD at the Université des Sciences Humaines.

In her Montreal study, Hornstein used French and English hospitals to illustrate its linguistic faultlines.

"The hospitals in Montreal demonstrate how the French and English split that has always defined the city is marked in the urban topography," said Hornstein, elaborating on her approach.

"The French and English hospitals hopscotch up Mount Royal in a quest for the highest perch. It is the English who are victorious."

In a similar vein, Hornstein examined the collision of French and German culture in Strasbourg, whose destiny was once inextricably linked to Germany's rivalry with France.

"I was deeply intrigued by how this manifests itself in the built environment," said Hornstein, who recently established York University's first Internet course in art history.

"I chose to explore the facades in Strasbourg that vary dramatically: the curvilinear, sinuous line of the Belgian and French Art Nouveau style, on the one hand, and the more geometric expression of the Art Nouveau (Jugendstil) movement in Germany and Austria, on the other hand.

"My objective was to highlight the role architecture plays in shaping political and social life."

In light of her academic proclivities, it is hardly surprising that Hornstein has taken a professional interest in the Holocaust.

Her next book, co-written with colleague and friend Florence Jacobowitz, is entitled Images and Remembrance: Questions of Representation and the Holocaust in Art and Film. It is scheduled to be published in 2001.

"In this book, we share concerns about the topicality of the Holocaust and its 'fashion' in critical theory and even in popular culture."

She and Jacobowitz also designed an award-winning course called Culture, Memory and Resistance: Responses to the Holocaust.

Over the years, Hornstein, 47, has taught courses on topics ranging from 19th- and 20th-century European art to Canadian and American art.

"My teaching has always been important to me," she said. "I feel privileged to share ideas with students."

She designed the Internet art history course because of her commitment to change and innovation.

"It came out of my desire to reach out and find students who prefer another way of learning and for whom campus lectures may not be an option," said Hornstein.

"The Internet is not the only way to attract students, but it is certainly one form that invites them into the world of art history and the university itself."

For a number of years now, Hornstein has led "travel and learn" tours to Italy and France. The excursions, she suggested, supplement traditional classroom teaching and turn students toward cultural experiences they may not have otherwise considered.

"These are very gratifying teaching moments," she noted, saying that her Romanian grandmother, Ruth, an educational travel consultant, conducted tours for youths and adults throughout her life.

Hornstein, the mother of three children, has no idea what drew her to art history. But, she added, " buildings and cities have always intrigued me, and cultural life within cities even more."

At her suggestion, the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) brought the Charlotte Salomon exhibition to Toronto. Salomon was a German-Jewish artist who died during the Holocaust.

"In the early 1990s, my daughter and I visited the Jewish Museum in Amsterdam and chanced upon a smattering of the Charlotte Salomon holdings which had recently been installed," said Hornstein.

"There was nothing more than a token display, poorly hung, and with very little explanatory notes, and no catalogue."

Shortly afterwards, in 1998, Hornstein's colleague in London, Monica Bohm-Duchen, curated a show on Salomon at the Royal Academy.

Bohm-Duchen was eager to find a North American venue, and Hornstein – a member of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies – discussed the matter with Matthew Teitelbaum, the director of the AGO. She convinced him that Salomon was worthy of wider attention.

And so Toronto became the first city in North America to introduce art lovers to Salomon.

Opinion

Variety, inspiration at AJS Conference

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When my mother told me she would be attending the 32nd Annual Association for Jewish Studies (AJS) conference in Boston this past December, I knew I had to join her. It especially appealed to me because I am a Jewish studies major.

The AJS, a constituent society of the American Council of Learned Societies, holds the conference to bring together all of its members on a yearly basis. Over 1,600 academics, publishers, archivists and students from around the world belong to the AJS.

Sessions were wide-ranging, with topics such as medieval Jewish science and cosmology, theology, liturgy and rabbinics, Jewish art and Yiddish drama, the Holocaust, Israeli postmodernism, and contemporary American Jewish life.

Three to five presenters each gave a twenty-minute lecture on the session's topic.

Participants included Susan Sered of Bar-Ilan University, who delivered a lecture called American Jewish Healing Services, Chronic Illness and the Invention of Tradition, Fritz Stern of Columbia University, who delivered the fourth annual AJS distinguished lecture, Albert Einstein and the German Question, and Judith R. Baskin of the University of Oregon, vice-president of the entire program, who chaired a session on women's identities in nineteenth-century Europe.

Some Canadian academics who participated were David Novak of the University of Toronto, who took part in a session on Jewish philosophy, James Arthur Diamond of the University of Waterloo and Sol Tanenzapf of York University, who both delivered papers on Maimonides, Sara R. Horowitz of York University who chaired a session called An Unlikely Muse: The Comic Spirit in Imaginative Representations of the Holocaust, and Lawrence J. Kaplan of McGill University, who chaired a session on modern approaches to halachah and was a panellist at the session called A Religion in Practice: Shifting Focus in the Study of Judaism.

I was especially interested in Norma Baumel Joseph's (Concordia University) lecture, Disruption in the Food Chain: Iraqi Jewish Women Recapture Baghdad.

Baumel Joseph discussed her research of the Iraqi Jewish community of Montreal. After interviewing women between the ages of 35 and 60, she identified many "areas of rupture" within the group. Women in the community have had to adjust to Canadian culture by, for example, adjusting their shopping, eating and cooking habits; adapting to the unavailability of key traditional ingredients; and shifting the customary importance of lunch to dinner.

Baumel Joseph demonstrated that food is no trivial matter. The preparation, serving and eating of food is a ritual activity that marks ethnicity, preserves identity and transmits tradition.

On that note, there was much food served at the conference. In addition to various receptions, there were evening activities and performances. After dinner the first night, the film The Wandering Jew was presented courtesy of Sharon Rivo and the National Center for Jewish Film at Brandeis University. Excerpts from Great Small Works' The Memoirs of the Glückel of Hameln, currently on stage in New York City, were performed on the second night of the conference. An interpretation of Glückel's memoirs, the play describes the life events of the seventeenth-century Jewish businesswoman from Hameln who later lived in Hamburg, Germany.

The conference sessions were stimulating. The hotel bar was often full late into the night with academics crowded around tables, sipping martinis and discussing anything from Lurianic kabbalah or Sabbateanism to Daniel Libeskind's new Jewish Museum in Berlin or the latest research on nineteenth-century Russian Jewish women.

It was an honour to meet many professors whose work I had read and studied. I had a wonderful discussion with renowned scholar, Chava Weissler of Lehigh University, about her work on tchines, the Yiddish vernacular devotional prayers of Ashkenazi women, analyzed and categorized in her book, Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women (Beacon Press, 1998).

Although I came home utterly exhausted, I was absolutely inspired.

The 33rd Annual AJS conference will be held in Washington, D.C., December 16-18, 2001. For more information, please call 781-736–2981, email ajs@brandeis.edu or visit www.brandeis.edu/ajs.

Lara Rabinovitch is a third year McGill University student studying at York University for the year.

To those who cared for the truth: The story of Nachman Zonabend

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

Though the ghetto of Lodz was liquidated in August 1944, a few Jews, guarded by Germans, were left behind to remove the signs of the Nazi atrocities. As soon as that task was completed, the remaining Jews were to be executed. They had already dug their own graves.

One day in October 1944, a member of this Jewish squad eluded his guards and embarked on a heroic mission. Nachman Zonabend, now an 82-year-old retired businessman living in Stockholm, Sweden, published a pamphlet in 1991, The Truth about the Saving of the Lodz Ghetto Archive, in which he describes his actions:

"I slipped unnoticed into the deserted print shop of the ghetto administration and came out with a complete set of announcements printed there during the years Rumkowski was chairman of the Judenrat [the Jewish council].

"My next step was to force my way into Rumkowski's office. There I could lay my hands on various papers, now scattered around and discarded, but only until recently meticulously sorted and filed. These papers contain but one long story of human tragedy and degradation."

By then, Chaim Mordechai Rumkowski and his family had voluntarily joined the last transport of Jews to Auschwitz in August 1944. They perished there.

Zonabend's next challenge was to hide the find. He deposited the documents in large glass jars that he buried in a remote part of the former ghetto, once again "evading the attention of the Germans and their Jewish helpers who were guarding us." In another hiding place Nachman Zonabend buried photographs, sketches and paintings from the ghetto.

Later, one day when he was led to the baths, Zonabend again slipped away unnoticed and found his way to the former ghetto post office, where he had once worked.

"On the floors of rooms that were now deadly quiet," he writes in the pamphlet, "the wind was scattering documents and papers and on one side was a row of suitcases secured with strings, apparently stuffed with the most value archive material."

Zonabend assumed that those about to hide the suitcases were discovered and had to abandon the project. He reports: "There was no time to lose. With difficulty I began to drag the heavy cases down the stairs to the deserted courtyard. There was no time for deliberation.

"Dripping with sweat I threw the cases into an empty and now dried-up well. All around me were bed quilts and pillows whose owners had probably already died in Auschwitz. I began to throw the bedding down the well to cover up the cases."

Zonabend held out until the Soviets liberated Lodz in January 1945. With great difficulty he went about trying to retrieve what he had hidden. In time, the invaluable documents were handed over to the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in New York and the archives at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust Memorial, in Jerusalem. Both institutions have published catalogues of their Nachman Zonabend collections.

In the preface to the Yad Vashem catalogue, Dr. Shmuel Krakowski writes: "Nachman Zonabend is one of those incredible Jews with a profound historical awareness, who during the Holocaust period managed to understand the importance of the tragic events. On his own initiative and consciously risking himself, Zonabend rescued documents of great value about the history of the Lodz ghetto."

In his pamphlet, Zonabend seeks to answer two questions that have been put to him again and again.

The first: "Why did you risk your life in order to save documents whose value you did not even realize, while the few Jews still remaining in the ghetto were trying to find shelter for themselves rather than for a pile of seemingly worthless papers?"

Feature

The second: "In the first days after the liberation, the days of worry for the fate for the nearest and dearest, of searching for accommodation and food, of uncertainty – and in view of the danger from Polish anti-Semites – didn't you think of anything more important that a risky recovery of rotting papers from a deep well?"

Zonabend's answer is instructive: "I was closely connected with the painters, draftsmen, writers and poets who were trying – often with superhuman effort and risking their lives – to document the terrible crimes and suffering surrounding them. I attended their meetings and discussions about how to preserve the evidence.

"Thus what I did was simply to continue the work of my friends – the majority of whom had already been dead by then. I felt that I could not allow their sacrifice and effort to go to waste and that it was my duty to do everything in my power to save their work."

His act of homage has at times been grossly misrepresented. His pamphlet is an attempt to set the record straight. "I became the butt of endless slanders and insinuations in the then-Stalinist Poland," he writes.

One article, published by a Jew in 1948 in a Yiddish publication in Poland, described him as "a Gestapo agent stained with the blood of Jewish victims." It was reprinted in several other Communist publications in the West.

All efforts to publish the truth, even the ruling by a World Jewish Congress tribunal, were ignored by the Jewish Communists. The same Soviets who liberated Jewish bodies knew how to poison Jewish minds.

Zonabend also takes issue with a statement by the outstanding historian of the Lodz ghetto, the late Lucjan Dobroszycki. In a footnote in the introduction to his monumental work, The Chronicle of the Lodz Ghetto 1941-1944 (Yale University Press, 1984), Dobroszycki suggests that Zonabend acted on instructions from a Bernard Ostrowski.

Zonabend is adamant: Ostrowski couldn't have given such instructions, for Zonabend did not even know him. The implied attempt to diminish Zonabend's heroic acts seems totally unwarranted.

The man who risked his life to save the evidence of Nazi atrocities is equally determined to preserve the facts from historians' elaborations and, perhaps, distortions.

What is most important for today's readers is to know that it was this unsung hero who, in homage to his murdered friends and out of the characteristically Jewish respect for the written word, has helped us to know the facts.

In so doing, Nachman Zonabend has contributed to our resolve that no amount of distortions by "revisionists" will obliterate the truth. We owe him, together with the other guardians of the truth, a profound debt of gratitude.

Holocaust experiences recalled

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Businessman and educator Philip Weiss spoke about his Holocaust experiences and presented awards for Holocaust education on Dec. 17.

The lecture and award ceremony, called An Evening with Philip Weiss — Reflections on his Spiritual Journey, attracted over 100 people. It was co-sponsored by Weiss through the Gertrude and Philip Weiss Endowment Fund, along with the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University's local chapter and the Shaarey Zedek Congregation.

Weiss clearly remembered the summer of 1939. "It was one of the most beautiful in living memory," he recalled.

"The mood in Europe was upbeat. In London, people were convinced there was no war looming on the horizon. In Berlin, Hitler was convinced that the West would not interfere in his expansion plans. While hundreds of thousands of Hitler youth were in summer camps, thousands of German Jews were already languishing in concentration camps."

Weiss and his family were living in the southern Polish town of Drohobycz near the Carpathian Mountains, where they had lived for generations. In 1939, the town's population was made up of 10,000 Poles, 10,000 Ukrainians and 15,000 Jews living in an uneasy coexistence.

After Poland was defeated, Drohobycz became part of the Soviet lands, until the Nazi invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941.

Weiss said his grandfather, his father and his uncles were among the 100,000 Jews who fought for Germany and Austria in World War I. Twenty thousand of them were decorated for their efforts.

The Nazis' "thanks," he noted, was Auschwitz.

During the pogroms of July 1941, Weiss' parents, brother and sister were saved by Ukrainian militiamen who put them and other skilled tradesmen under protective custody.

Weiss remembered the ghetto as a place of hunger, cold, sickness and death. He was taken away early on to a labour camp where, he said, you did whatever you were told.

"Overnight, I was transformed from a middle-class Jewish student to a slave labourer," he said. "Abuse and beatings were constant and the food was barely enough to keep us alive."

Weiss was put to work in a salt mine with other Jewish and Polish prisoners. The only clothes they had were jackets, pants and wooden clogs. Metal bowls were distributed for the coffee and thin soup that was their sustenance.

From there, Weiss was deported to Plaszow, the camp made famous in the movie Schindler's List.

Two scenes Weiss said he will never forget there were the sights of skeletal Hungarian Jewish girls, their heads shaved, dressed only in nightgowns, and a young SS man casually machine-gunning Polish patriots sentenced to be executed.

"I can't forget or forgive," Weiss said. "The Zundels and Keegstras and Christies can't forget either because they never saw these things in the first place."

Weiss' next stop was Mauthausen — hell on earth, he called it — where thousands of young people had to climb 164 steps carrying heavy stones. If they couldn't carry the stones, they were shot. Weiss saved his life by offering his services as a technician to the Germans.

"I wasn't a technician," he said, "but I knew it was the only way I could survive."

On May 5, 1945, Mauthausen was liberated by American soldiers.

"We were free," Weiss recalled, "but we didn't know what to do. We felt lost. It took a long time for us to become normal human beings again. We were a mass of brutalized humanity, smelly and dirty, in striped uniforms."

SS men changed into the striped uniforms to try to hide from the Allied forces and escape justice. Those who were recognized by their full faces and well-fed bodies were executed on the spot.

After spending some months in hospital recovering from his ordeal, Weiss went to work for the American army intelligence service tracking down ex-SS men hiding among the civilian population.

In 1946, he was repatriated to Poland but escaped after being put in a Soviet military camp. Back in the west, he was put in charge of a displaced persons camp which included men he knew were war criminals.

From there, he went to work for an American army kiosk in Linz, where he was reunited with his family who learned through a BBC broadcast that he was still alive.

The family came to Winnipeg in the late 1940s. Weiss remembered being welcomed at a reception attended by leaders of the Jewish community.

Soon after, he met his wife, Gertrude (who passed away five years ago) and raised his own family.

In 1967, Weiss went back to Germany, to Bremen, to testify in the trial of a former SS officer charged with crimes against humanity. The man was sentenced to life in prison and stripped of all of his possessions.

By the 1980s, Weiss was a successful businessman. Over the past 20 years, he has been president of the Rosh Pina Synagogue, chair of the Winnipeg Holocaust Remembrance Committee and a board member of the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University.

After his lecture, Weiss presented the first Gertrude and Philip Weiss Endowment for Holocaust Education citations to a number of Winnipeg high school history teachers and professors. He also presented an award to the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University for the organization's encouragement of Holocaust education.

Politicians tired and cranky

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

As we all settle into the habit of dating our check-books with the year 2001, the Hill is rousing itself out of election-induced hibernation. Naturalists tell us that bears are pretty cantankerous when first venturing out of their dens and early reports suggest a similar disposition among our federal politicians.

One would think that Monsieur Three-peat would be in exultant spirits given his big election win. But truth be told, le petit gars de Shawinigan is just plain tired. The trials he had to overcome during the campaign, mostly from within his own ranks, have taken a toll. So spent was the prime minister, that he could not face the gruelling task of selecting a new cabinet.

To deflect some attention away from internal politics, Chrétien let slip that his real agenda for the next session of Parliament will focus on the traditional Liberal vision of enhanced social programs. This came as a bit of a shock since not a word of what is evidently a well-developed plan was broached during the campaign.

That news pushed the unsung hero of the Liberal team, Paul Jr., into an aggravated state of depression. With his eye on the sinking markets and alarming economic slow-down in the U.S., the perennial finance minister knows that we cannot afford extravagant new social programs. He must reconcile his desire to grab the keys to 24 Sussex Drive with his need to maintain his image as the Miracle Minister.

Neither is all well on the other side of the House. Stockwell Day has been busy blaming the poor Alliance showing alternately on the media, saboteurs determined to impugn the reputation of his righteous party, godless foes who feel threatened by his personal faith, and finally, on himself as well for failing to follow his own instincts.

Joe Who is feeling pretty cranky, too. Ironically, he has only himself to blame. Winning a seat in Calgary makes it impossible for him to quit the party, something his close friends claim he is desperate to do. If he steps down, the Tories (currently with 12 seats) will lose party status and he will end his political career with the epitaph that he doomed the Tories to oblivion.

Finally, we have Twiddle Dee, who hasn't yet caught on to the fact that her party has taken out a contract on her leadership, and Twiddle Dum, who is still in shock, trying to reconcile his successful campaign with the dismal BQ result on election night.

Oh well. Plus ça change...

Bimah from seniors' residence finds a new home

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The bimah from the original Hillel Lodge seniors' residence has found a new home in suburban Barrhaven.

Rabbi Menachem Blum matched a shul that was without a bimah to the bimah, which no longer had a shul.

For over a year, Rabbi Blum has been holding weekly Shabbat services in the basement of his home.

Now known as Ottawa Torah Centre Chabad, the little neighbourhood shul has been drawing more and more regular attendees. The group has persevered with a borrowed Torah and a table that doubled as a bimah.

"There is a growing community in Barrhaven, and a synagogue is being planned. We went from a minyan once a month three years ago to weekly services, says Rabbi Blum.

"We have a new Torah coming in a few months to replace the one we borrowed from Young Israel Congregation. We have the furniture; now we are just working on the structure."

Originally farmland, Barrhaven is now the fastest growing area of the Ottawa region.

Major employers such as Nortel and JDS have recently located there, bringing with them thousands of employees, and spurring retail and commercial development.

Tremendous growth is planned for the next few years as well. New houses are being built, and many are occupied by young and growing families.

Rabbi Blum stands ready to serve those who are looking for a Jewish presence in their new neighbourhood and was pleased to accept the offer of a bimah from Hillel Lodge.

When the lodge closed its doors recently, it moved to a new state of the art facility that included a fully equipped chapel.

..The bimah was only one of many items that were given away during the move.

Executive director Stephen Schneiderman said every effort was made to ensure that nothing be simply thrown out.

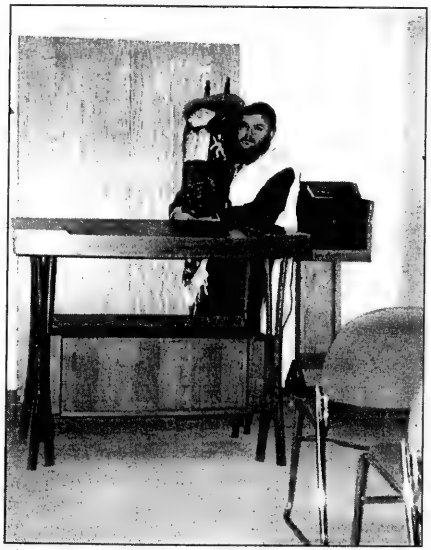
"Our only criteria for giving things away was that the items be put to good use, and that it would be immediate use. We didn't want things to be put in storage, he said."

Beds were given to a women's shelter, to a mission for palliative care and to a local high school that offers a training course for people who want to become personal care aides.

Kitchen equipment was given to Camp B'nai Brith, pews were given to Agudath Israel Congregation, and some of the furniture made its way to the Jewish Family Services depot to be distributed to immigrants and the needy.

"We didn't sell anything," said Schneiderman.

"We are a charitable institution and we are happy that the equipment is being put to good use. We don't want to destroy things; we want to preserve them."



The new home for original bimah from Hillel Lodge seniors' residence is in suburban Barrhaven.

Concessions force Israelis to re-examine beliefs

By DAVID LANDAU
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The angry, anguished cry of "Uganda" is filling the air in Israel these days.

It doesn't mean much to the uninitiated. But for those schooled in the fundamentals of Zionist history, this esoteric code word says it all.

Uganda was where the Zionist movement, back in 1903, had considered setting up a Jewish homeland. But the plan was rejected, as the majority in the movement overruled founder Theodor Herzl and held that only Zion – the biblical name for Jerusalem – could be the legitimate and practical goal of Zionism.

Analysis

From the Knesset plenum to coffee shops to private homes, Israelis are again conducting the wrenching, back-to-basics argument over the heart and soul of their national project.

The negotiations with the Palestinians – accompanied as they are by terror and bloodshed – and the upcoming election are forcing every Israeli to examine anew the tenets of the Zionist credo.

Most people here find it shocking that the Temple Mount and the walled Old City of Jerusalem, focal points of Jewish longing for centuries, have been placed squarely on the negotiating table after 33 years of assurances from politicians of all stripes that Israeli sovereignty over these sites is non-negotiable.

The Camp David summit in July appeared to fail over Prime Minister Ehud Barak's unwillingness to give up Israeli control of the Temple Mount.

And while his flexibility on Jerusalem went far beyond the Israeli consensus, Barak still appeared to be searching for ways to give the Palestinians a say in running Arab neighbourhoods without dividing up sovereignty in the city.

Now, Barak and his depleted governing coalition have turned around so suddenly that it is hard to gauge public reaction with any accuracy.

Polls published last weekend show that Barak is trailing badly behind Ariel Sharon, the Likud party's candidate for prime minister in the Feb. 6 election. The polls give Barak the support of between one-quarter and one-third of the electorate.

However, President Bill Clinton's peace package, which calls for deep Israeli concessions in Jerusalem, is doing significantly better in the polls than Barak. Close to half the country supports the proposals, though those proposals still have to be precisely defined.

Many Israelis say they are unhappy with the thought of Jerusalem being carved into a latticework of sovereignties. Fewer seem overly perturbed by the idea of ceding sovereignty over the Temple Mount, site of the biblical Jewish Temples and today home to the Al-Aksa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock.

According to the polls, even fewer Israelis seem concerned by the prospect of giving the Palestinians military and civilian control over such sacred sites as the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron or Rachel's Tomb just outside Bethlehem.

Interestingly, the fault line between right and left does not correspond precisely to the religious-secular divide. While the Orthodox communities are profoundly attached to the Tomb of the Patriarchs, Rachel's Tomb, Joseph's Tomb in Nablus and the ancient Peace on Israel synagogue in Jericho – the latter two defiled and burned by Palestinian rioters in recent months – they are profoundly ambivalent about the Temple Mount.

Less opposition to ceding sovereignty over Temple Mount

This reflects the prohibition in Jewish law forbidding Jews from setting foot on the Temple Mount. Jewish law regards everyone today as ritually impure and requires a process of purification that can only be undertaken, according to most halachic authorities, when the Temple is standing.

The view is not unanimous, however, and a few Orthodox rabbis contend that Jews may indeed visit the Mount, avoiding only a particular patch where it is believed that the Temple's Holy of Holies once stood.

Still, the mainstream halachic prohibition dovetailed nicely with Israel's political decision just after the 1967 Six Day War to leave civilian control of the Temple Mount in the hands of the Muslim religious trust, and to prohibit Jewish prayer at the site so as not to provoke Muslim anger.

Last week Barak said he would not sign the Temple Mount over to the Palestinians, but left open the possibility that sovereignty could be transferred to a third party. Leaders of the religious Zionist movement, which largely abides by the halachic prohibition on visiting the Mount, regard Barak's readiness to bargain over the area as heretical.

The differences within Orthodoxy were starkly evident last week when religious Zionist rabbis failed to obtain the backing of ultra-Orthodox rabbis for a public campaign against Temple Mount concessions.

In contrast, non-Orthodox rightists, whose ties to the holy places are less religious than historical, national and emotional, put the Temple Mount at the top of their loyalties and political priorities.

Ultimately, Barak believes, Israel's secular majority will be prepared to forgo control over the holy sites, including the Temple Mount, for a peace treaty. Any such treaty would contain detailed provisions ensuring rights of access and worship for Jews at these holy sites.

However, history raises questions about the credibility of such provisions.

In 1948, the Israeli-Jordanian armistice accord provided for Jewish access to the Western Wall. In practice, however, Israelis were barred from praying there, and Jordanian soldiers and civilians defiled Jewish synagogues and graves in eastern Jerusalem.

The past three months of Palestinian violence, replete with acts of wanton sacrilege against Jewish holy sites – and some reprisals by Jews against former Muslim mosques inside Israel – have eroded any confidence Israelis might have had in the Palestinian commitment to honour such provisions.

Would that lack of trust cause secular Israelis to oppose a peace accord, assuming its security-related aspects – the army's right to fly over Palestinian areas, to maintain listening posts on key mountaintops and to deploy tanks near the Jordan River if threatened from the east – are satisfactory?

That is difficult to assess. The perennial tension between religious and secular in Israel may undermine the secular majority's sympathy for the sensibilities of the religious minority regarding the holy sites.

Fatah implicated in Tel Aviv bombing

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Shin Bet security service is holding a suspect for the Tel Aviv bus bombing in December, security sources said last Sunday.

The investigation has revealed that members of Fatah and of the Palestinian Authority military intelligence organization were responsible for the attack that injured 14 Israelis.

It is the first time Fatah has been implicated in a terrorist attack within the pre-1967 borders of Israel since the Oslo agreements were signed in 1993.

On the night after the attack, security forces arrested a Jordanian citizen, Abdallah Abu-Jabr, 25, who admitted that he had planted the bomb and reconstructed the attack for interrogators.

Abu-Jabr was living in Israel for two years as an illegal resident, working as a night watchman at a beach restaurant in Rishon Letzion. A relative, a Fatah activist living in Nablus, recruited him for the attack. On the day of the attack, a senior security source said, his handlers gave Abu-Jabr the bomb; he then travelled to Netanya, where he boarded a bus for Tel Aviv.

In Tel Aviv he boarded a No. 51 bus and a short while later, he got off and then activated the bomb by cellular phone, the source said.

He received no money for the attack, and appears not to have acted out of ideology, but simply under the influence of his relative, the source said.

The investigation revealed that some of Abu-Jabr's handlers were officers in the PA's military intelligence organization, headed by Mussa Arafat. The defence establishment is unsure to what extent the organization might have been implicated, and has no evidence that Mussa Arafat himself was involved in any planning of the attack.

Other people linked to the incident live in the PA-controlled areas and have not been arrested. Police are holding two additional suspects – an Israeli Arab from Jaffa and a Moroccan citizen, whom Abu-Jabr is suspected of having tried to recruit for Fatah.

"I am being careful not to say Fatah has gone back to being a terrorist organization because we are speaking about a party not an organization," the security source said.

He added that there are "militant activists" in the Tanzim militia movement who have gone back to the terrorist path and have no qualms about carrying out attacks within Israel.

The Shin Bet is also investigating a suspicion that Fatah was responsible for detonating a small bomb near a Jerusalem theatre some two months ago.

The security forces have yet to come up with answers to other terror attacks within Israel – in Hadera, Netanya and Jerusalem – since the start of the latest intifadah in late September.

The security establishment is examining ways to enforce the law forbidding Israelis to hire Palestinians or Jordanians without a permit.

Abdullah backs 'right of return'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — King Abdullah of Jordan expressed his support for the demands made by the Palestinians in the peace process with Israel, particularly the refugees' right of return, during a meeting Sunday in Amman with Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat.

In remarks published by Jordan's official Petra news agency, the king said that "finding a just solution to the issue of refugees, which guarantees their right to return home and be compensated, based on resolutions of international legitimacy, is a basic requirement for achieving peace."

The two Arab leaders met at an air base outside the Jordanian capital to discuss Arafat's recent talks with U.S. President Bill Clinton in Washington.

The King's statements were the first Jordanian response to the Clinton proposals put forth to the Israeli and Palestinian sides as the basis for further negotiations toward a final status agreement.

Upon his return to PA territory, Arafat said that he is still waiting for American clarifications in response to the reservations expressed by the Palestinians at Clinton's bridging proposals.

Arafat has held a series of meetings with Arab leaders in the past few days to discuss the Clinton plan.

Meimad withholds its support for Barak

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Meimad faction decided Sunday night not to express support for incumbent Ehud Barak in the race for prime minister.

The members of the faction, a partner in Barak's One Israel coalition, have been given the freedom to vote as they see fit for now. The party will choose between the two candidates at a later date.

The decision was a compromise between the hawkish element of the party, headed by Rabbi Yehuda Gilad, and the faction's dovish camp, headed by Yitzhak Frankental of the Netivot Shalom movement.

Almost all speakers at Sunday night's debate harshly criticized Barak, attacking his proposed "civic revolution" and his willingness to make far-reaching compromises. Some, like former lawmaker Yehuda Ben-Meir, even suggested that the party should resign from the government immediately. Others suggested the party should call on Barak to step down in favour of Shimon Peres.

Israel holds information on the involvement of senior members of these organizations in attacks against Israeli targets, although no direct associations have been made with the three top Palestinian security figures: Jibril Rajoub, Muhammed Dahlan and Amin al-Hindi.

More than 70 percent of the attacks were carried out by members of Fatah or the security organizations, and the rest by the opposition groups, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The Islamic radicals released from PA prisons at the start of the violence are involved significantly in attacks against Israel.

According to Shin Bet information, Dr. Thabet Thabet, who was the Fatah's secretary general in the Tul Karm area and was shot dead by Israeli snipers two weeks ago, was directly involved in planning and directing a number of attacks against Israel.

The senior Israeli source says Thabet played a direct role in directing armed Fatah teams to carry out attacks against Israeli vehicles.

Security sources claim that Thabet was responsible for dozens of shooting incidents and for the injury of IDF soldiers and settlers.

Moderates are worlds apart

This past summer, the Globe and Mail printed an important op-ed by Mark Heller of Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies presenting the overwhelming Israeli consensus against the Palestinians' claim of a "right of return" to present-day Israel ("Palestinians, you can't go home again," July 14).

This article was especially important coming, as it did, from a highly respected academic who strongly supports Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation.

However, as Heller noted, a willingness to compromise (which the majority of Israelis have long been prepared for in exchange for genuine security guarantees) has its limit at the "right of return": Israelis cannot accept this proposal because to do so would effectively mean committing national suicide.

Just recently, the Globe printed Palestinian journalist Rami Khouri's "It's our right, let us return" (January 1). Khouri is considered by many to be a moderate who favours a two-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians.

However, when reading Khouri's article alongside Heller's, one cannot escape the conclusion that these moderates are worlds apart on the most fundamental issue currently dividing Israelis and Palestinians.

Heller notes that "the major reason" for the creation of the Palestinian refugee problem in 1947-48 was the Arab side's rejection of the UN partition plan in November 1947 and, six months later, the Arab invasion of the newborn state of Israel.

Meanwhile, Khouri, who in past Globe articles has praised Israel's "new historians" for their adherence to objective history, completely ignores the role of Arab rejectionism and hostility in causing the refugee problem.

By sidestepping the most basic and indisputable facts of history, Khouri violates the spirit of intellectual integrity he formerly praised in some Israelis. Numerous other such omissions and distortions of fact pepper Khouri's article, which argues that Israelis have nothing to fear from accepting a Palestinian "right of return."

Prepared by Paul Michaels, director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

No Jews named to Bush cabinet, but most Jewish groups don't care

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — As President-elect George W. Bush unveiled his cabinet over the last few weeks, the buzzword has been diversity.

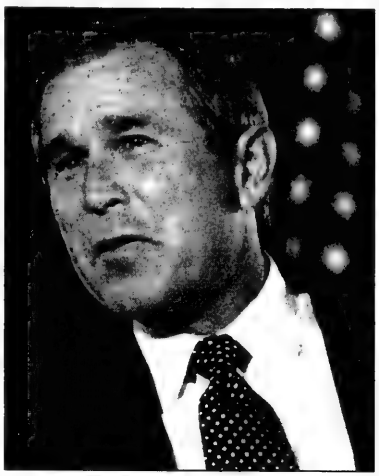
A Republican party with a reputation for appointing mostly white males welcomed several members of ethnic minorities to the administration's highest offices. Jews, however, were left out of the mix.

The omission has left some Jewish leaders concerned about their relationship with the new White House, but most dismiss the notion that Jews must have a representative in the cabinet.

"The Jewish community has graduated beyond the point where, at every election, we have to hold a stopwatch and count how many people cross the finish line," said Jason Isaacson, director of government and international affairs of the American Jewish Committee.

Jews make up 10 percent of the Senate, and there are 27 Jews in the 435-member House of Representatives. Two Jews sit on the Supreme Court.

With a few notable exceptions, almost all the Jewish political officials are Democrats. That's not surprising, as American Jews are predominantly Democratic and voted overwhelmingly for Vice-President Al Gore in November.



President-elect George W. Bush

Bush, on the other hand, made unprecedented overtures to Arab American voters, especially in states such as Michigan, where they are an important constituency.

Nonetheless, some Jewish leaders expected a seat at Bush's cabinet table.

Five Jews served in President Bill Clinton's cabinet. And while no Jews served in the cabinets of Ronald Reagan or George Bush Sr., there were four in Jimmy Carter's cabinet and several in the Gerald Ford, Richard Nixon, Lyndon Johnson and John F. Kennedy administrations.

Ira Forman, executive director of the National Jewish Democratic Council, said the absence of a Jew in the cabinet does not bode well for the community's influence with the Bush White House.

"Either their circle of friends doesn't include Jews or the Jews just didn't get picked," Forman said. "I think it is the former."

Marshall Breger, who served as Reagan's liaison to the Jewish community, said the Republican party does not believe ethnic or other minority groups hold entitlements to a cabinet seat.

"That is not the rhetoric in the Republican world," Breger said. "You don't have interest groups demanding cabinet offices like trophies."

But the absence of Jews is made more striking by the evident pains Bush took to diversify his cabinet.

Among his selections were two African Americans, Gen. Colin Powell and Rod Paige; an Arab American, former senator Spencer Abraham; and several women.

The only Jew who received serious consideration was Paul Wolfowitz, who was considered for defence secretary before Bush selected Donald Rumsfeld. Wolfowitz was undersecretary of defence in the administration of the elder Bush and was foreign policy adviser for the Republican campaign last year.

Linda Chavez, Bush's selection for labour secretary, is married to Christopher Gersten, a former executive director of the Republican Jewish Coalition (RJC), and their children are being raised Jewish.

Ari Fleischer, who was named White House press secretary last week, said that any criticism of the Bush White House's composition is premature, because several important positions remain vacant.

Fleischer will be one of several prominent Jewish faces in the White House, even though they will not hold cabinet rank. Former Indianapolis mayor Stephen Goldsmith, who served as Bush's domestic policy adviser during the campaign, is expected to receive a White House job.

In addition, Joshua Bolten will be Bush's deputy chief of staff for policy.

Several Jewish leaders cited Fleischer's appointment as a significant one, as he will be the administration's mouthpiece and will have the president's ear.

"There are enough people in the administration and in the office of the president to ensure that Jewish concerns are going to be closely articulated," said Breger, a professor of law at Catholic University.

He said it is too early to claim that Jews have been left out of the loop because sub-cabinet positions, such as undersecretaries and assistant secretaries, have not been filled. Breger also said organizations like the RJC have access to all levels of the incoming administration.

"People are looking for a chance to claim that they have been dissed," he said. "We haven't seen any signs of it."

While acknowledging disappointment among the Jewish community, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said the issue is not very important.

"We, as a community, once we broke that initial ceiling, have never been in favor of quotas," Foxman said.

But while it may not be a make-or-break issue for the community's relationship with the Bush camp, several Jewish leaders said they were saddened to see no Jew named to the cabinet. Ironically, this comes just after Senator Joseph Lieberman, Gore's running mate, became the first Jew chosen as a major party's vice-presidential candidate, seemingly heralding a new level of acceptance for Jews in American political life.

"It's a little distressing that [Bush] sought to diversify the cabinet... and no Jew was chosen," said Phil Baum, executive director of the American Jewish Congress.

But Baum said he is more concerned with the policy positions the cabinet nominees will take than with their religious affiliation.

Other Jewish leaders echoed those remarks, saying they question the policies being initiated by the new White House and the domestic policy agenda of several nominees, especially the attorney general-designate, former senator John Ashcroft.

On the other hand, Jewish leaders have been impressed by the pro-Israel positions of several of the cabinet selections.

"The irony of it all is, this is a guy who set up a cabinet that is closer to what America is, and he isn't getting credit for it," Foxman said. "The only ones who are asking 'Where are we?' are the Jews."

Report slams OU over sex abuse case

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — With a new president and plans for an overhaul, the Orthodox Union (OU) is trying to restore its credibility after a report found "profound errors of judgment" in the way its leaders dealt with a rabbi who allegedly abused scores of teenagers.

However, judging from the responses at the organization's recent biennial convention here, it appears the new plans will not be enough to satisfy all constituents.

A heated session on the issue ran a full hour longer than scheduled. Harvey Blitz, the OU's new president, called the behaviour of longtime youth leader Rabbi Baruch Lanner a "stain and blemish" on the group, one "we're going to work hard to remedy."

Blitz, who has been an officer with the OU for more than 20 years, replaces Dr. Mandell Ganchrow as president.

Rabbi Lanner is accused of sexually assaulting at least 26 teenage girls and physically assaulting many boys. A summary of an OU report on the charges was released Dec. 26.

Blitz, who had been scheduled to replace Ganchrow even before news of the scandal broke, said a 13-member commission of board members appointed by Ganchrow would suggest ways to implement the report's recommendations.

The report also noted a larger problem of "poor management practices" in the Orthodox Union. Blitz said the OU would appoint review committees in the areas of structure and governance; the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), the OU's youth group; personnel; and finance.

Blitz said the Lanner report would be his first priority as president and promised that the committees would work quickly, though he did not offer specific completion dates for their work.

In questions at the session and in comments afterward, critics raised the following concerns:

• The OU will not disclose the full 332-page report, which names members of its professional and lay leadership who were aware of Lanner's behaviour. The summary released Dec. 26 also does not contain names.

• The organization has not stated how it will discipline top professionals, particularly executive vice president Rabbi Raphael Butler, who allowed Rabbi Lanner to continue at his post despite "red flags" about his behaviour.

• Decisions about implementing the report are being left to a committee of 13 men, four of whom Blitz said are cited as having some knowledge of Rabbi Lanner's behaviour. Final decisions will be made by the organization's executive committee, which has fewer than 10 percent female members.

• There was no consensus on whether the OU engaged in a coverup to protect Rabbi Lanner or whether key professionals simply made errors of judgment.

The bulk of the criticism at the convention came from synagogue members from New Jersey, many of whom were victimized by Rabbi Lanner or knew his victims. Outside this core, the OU's constituency appears divided on whether the organization's current plans are sufficient.

One issue that arose repeatedly at the session, and remained unresolved, was the extent to which OU officials were aware of Rabbi Lanner's behaviour but failed to discipline him.

The report summary says only that "certain members of the OU and NCSY leadership share responsibility for Lanner's misconduct," without specifying who knew what.

Ganchrow said the commission report concluded there was no coverup, but simply "errors of judgment and failure to see red flags."

Blitz, too, said "Complicity was not something that came flying off the pages of the report," adding, "Some will reach the conclusion that they couldn't have known, others that they must have known. It's not 100 percent clear."

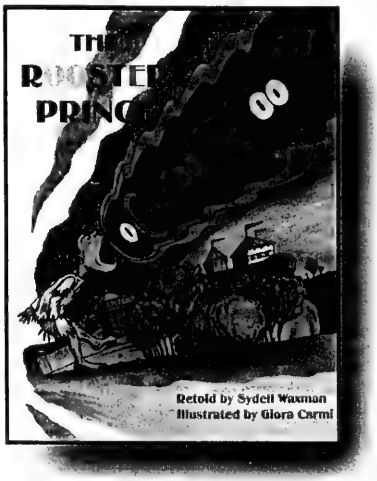
A rooster doesn't have to be just a rooster

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

These days, if someone thought he was a rooster, his parents would take him to a special doctor called a psychiatrist. But a long time ago, there were no psychiatrists, and even if you were a mighty and important king, you might not be able to do anything to help your son.

And who would want a prince who acts like a rooster?

That is what happened in the story of The Rooster Prince (Pitspopany Press, 2000). This story is really a very old one that was originally told by a famous chassidic rabbi called the Bratslover Rebbe. In this book, Sydell Waxman, a Canadian author, retold the story, and Giora Carmi drew the pictures.



Rabbis used to tell stories that demonstrated whatever lesson they were trying to teach. Come to think of it, many still do.

Chassidim, by the way, are very religious Jews, who, besides following the rules of the Torah and the Talmud, follow the teachings of their leaders, called rebbes. You may have heard of some chassidic groups, such as Lubavitch, Satmar, Bobov or Ger. The leadership is usually passed down within the same family.

The followers of Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav are a little different. When he died about 300 years ago, his Chassidim decided no one could ever take his place, and since then, there has never been another Bratslover rebbe.

In The Rooster Prince, a little Jewish boy named Avron was walking home from the market, bringing a chicken to his family for Shabbat. On the way, he met a messenger from the czar, who was yelling that a fine reward would be given to anyone who could help the prince – who thought he was a rooster.

Since the czar was a very cruel king who used to kill people if they didn't do what he wanted, no one offered to help.

When the messenger saw that Avron was carrying a chicken, he grabbed him, pulled him onto his horse and took him back to the palace. "You carry chickens around with you. You must know about chickens and roosters," he said.

Avron might have known something about chickens (especially how to eat them), but he certainly didn't know how to cure a prince who thought he was a rooster.

When he made friends with the prince by yelling Cock-a-doodledoo, he figured out something that he thought might work.

Avron took off his clothes and spent the day doing rooster things, like digging in the earth and eating grains.

When night fell and it got cold, Avron put on his pants and shirt. After all, he told the prince, he was a "fine, special rooster," and since he was such a fine special rooster, he didn't have to be cold.

The prince thought that that sounded sensible, so he put on pants and a shirt too.

Eventually, Avron cured the prince (well, sort of) and went back to his mother and father, driving "a wagon filled with chickens and a purse overflowing with gold rubles."

The lesson that Rabbi Nachman wanted to teach with this story was that, just as Avron had to behave like a rooster to make the prince act like a prince again, so, too, a rabbi has to act like the ordinary people to be able to help them act the way they are supposed to.

You might be interested in why the Bratslover Chassidim still think so highly about Rabbi Nachman. When Adolf Hitler came to power during World War II and the Bratslover Chassidim were put into concentration camps or tried to escape from the Nazis, some of them took apart the chair that had been the rebbe's, and each of them carried a little piece of it. They promised that after the war, they would gather in Israel and put the chair (and the group) back together again.

Although millions of Jews died, including many Bratslover, all of those people who had a part of the chair survived, met again in Israel – and put the chair back together again!

'Israel is as safe as ever,' Minister of Tourism says

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The day after 11 people were injured in a terrorist attack on a bus in Tel Aviv, Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Israel's Minister of Tourism, told a group of travel professionals in Toronto that "Israel is as safe as anywhere else in the world."

At a luncheon sponsored by the Israel Government Tourist Office, Lipkin-Shahak said his government is attempting to convince Foreign Affairs Canada to amend its travel advisory to Israel because the department's list of potential danger spots is too general and reflects information that is months out of date.

"There are areas that are not recommended for tourists, for instance Gaza," Lipkin-Shahak said. "But it's not so true for Bethlehem, and Bethlehem witnessed a very sad Christmas this year. We do not recommend that tourists go to the West Bank — but we do encourage people to go to Jerusalem, Haifa, Akko, Tel Aviv, the Galilee, the Dead Sea and Eilat."

The Israeli government is likewise attempting to convince the United States to lift its travel warning for Israel or restrict it to problem areas like the West Bank and Gaza, Lipkin-Shahak said.

"We're living our normal life and we're doing all the normal things [in Israel]. It's true that our morale is affected when we watch television, and these terrible events do have an impact on us. But Israel is as safe as ever and tourists are still coming, though not in the numbers that we expected."

One of Israel's key peace negotiators with much experience at Camp David and Oslo, Lipkin-Shahak indicated that Israel is not the only country in the region whose tourism industry has suffered since the renewed Palestinian intifadah.

"I had a number of talks with the Jordanian minister of tourism... Jordan is suffering no less than what we're suffering, maybe more. Egypt is also suffering, least of all because Israelis are not going to Egypt these days."

In previous times, an average of 400,000 Israelis visited Egypt each year, he said.

David Freudmann, a travel consultant with Toronto-based Uniworld Travel and Tours, asked the visiting minister if the Israeli government was genuinely committed to attracting tourists, since a recent strike by workers within the country's Interior Ministry prevented thousands of travellers from attaining visas and forced the cancellation of several large group trips.

"The strike is over now but it's true, we lost a few thousand tourists because of it," Lipkin-Shahak responded. "We tried to tell them that they're damaging the tourism industry and they said, 'Yes, this is the purpose of our strike.'"

The assembly applauded Toronto tour operator Sarah Pachter who revealed that she had recently completed her 146th trip to Israel after participating in the solidarity group mission in November.

Canadian Jewish Congress President Moshe Ronen brought greetings from that organization, and assured the visiting Israeli delegation of "the strong bond between Israel and the Jewish community" of Canada.

"We'll continue to do what we can to encourage more solidarity and more visits," Ronen said.

Religious pilgrimage to Holy Land 'trouble and stress-free'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto-based Christian educator Kitty McGilly was preparing to take a group of Christian pilgrims to Israel last October when the Palestinian intifadah re-ignited and her travel agent urged her to cancel because of safety concerns.

McGilly did indeed cancel the trip, but the group outvoted her and decided to go despite the travel agent's warning. "We reconfirmed our itinerary and went two days later," she reports. "That was probably the best thing I ever did, because then I saw for myself what the situation was."

McGilly came back home more determined than ever to show Canadians the Christian holy sites in Israel. She hosted a group of 40 people to Israel in early December, and was preparing to embark with another group of about 30 people in late December, when she spoke with The CJN.

"I've brought two full groups since the troubles began, and we've had a very stress-free, trouble-free itinerary," said McGilly, who has conducted about two dozen group tours to Israel since 1993.

Led by an experienced guide, her early-December group visited Christian sites at Nazareth, the Sea of Galilee, Bethlehem and Jerusalem, where all but the Temple Mount was closed to them. "There were no line-ups anywhere, and we saw no evidence of violence or fighting whatsoever," she said.

"I've been to Israel over 25 times and we use the same guide each time. These are people who know the areas and have relationships with the people in each of the places. It's not like doing a tour without knowing where you're going or who you're talking to."

Some tour operators who cater to the Jewish market must likely wish that North American Jews would follow the intrepid example of McGilly and other Christian pilgrims. A common lament of Israeli tourism officials is that North American Jews seem to stay away in droves in times of trouble, even though Christians continue to come.

"There are very few groups going now, and the people are hurting," McGilly said. "Tourism is such a large part of their livelihood, and economically, it's hit them very hard."

An adult faith consultant with a master's degree in theology, McGilly conducted religious retreats for the Catholic School Board until her retirement from the board two years ago. Her popular "Faith Journeys" to Israel are meant to help participants gain deeper insight into the Christian religion.

"In ten days or two weeks in the Holy Land, you can learn so much more than sitting in a classroom day after day," she said.

"I'd like to see more Christians going to the Holy Land and being peace instruments. Because certainly, Muslims and Jews can live together, they've proved that. There's no need to be at loggerheads like this."

Ozick's essays take literature and its creators to heart

Anne Frank, Raskolnikov and others examined in book

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Opening Quarrel and Quandary, Cynthia Ozick's latest collection of essays, is like removing the lid from a box of quality chocolates: one doesn't know where to begin.

Despite a few mysterious squiggles and shapes, most of Ozick's bonbons have delectable fillings, as one might expect from the Jewish world's foremost belle-lettrist. Some of these pieces may also be familiar to readers of The New Yorker and other publications where they first appeared.

Perhaps the most celebrated and discussed of these essays is Who Owns Anne Frank?, the author's frank and forthright attempt to remove the sugar coating from our perception of the teenage diarist.

Ozick contends that the early, bowdlerized version of Frank's diary, as well as the subsequent plays and movie, gave us entirely the wrong impression of her.

Despite Frank's much-trumpeted optimism, reiterated in her highly quoted belief that people "are basically good at heart," she knew full well what the Nazis were doing, Ozick tells us. Further, she was not a literary naif but recognized the power of her pen, and spent much effort polishing her prose.

Had she lived, she would have been one of the top-ranking Jewish writers of the postwar era, Ozick says.

If Anne Frank has become an icon and the closest thing to a saint that exists in the Jewish world, Ozick, commendably, has done her best to strip back the veneer and reveal the reality beneath. Anne's diary does not contain a triumphant story of the human spirit, Ozick asserts, but a pathetic account of a life in hiding from the Nazis — one of over six million lives that the Nazis expunged. The Diary is not a tender tale of teenaged love blossoming under extremely adverse conditions, but a tragic chronicle of dehumanization and defeat, whose postscript is death.

Besides reclaiming the real Anne Frank and relegating the Hollywoodized version to the dustbin of history, Ozick evokes another phoenix from the ashes by writing of the diarist with an affection, impossible to hide, of the sort that might normally be reserved for a friend, a professional colleague, or even a sister.

Ozick would likely have known Frank had she survived, and her opening sentence shocks us by projecting her as a real, living person into our present-day world: "If Anne Frank had not perished in the criminal malevolence of Bergen-Belsen early in 1945, she would have marked her 70th birthday at the brink of the 21st century."

It's Ozick's ability of personalizing the printed page, of taking literature and its creators to heart, that enlivens her prose.

In Dostoyevsky's Unabomber, she contemporizes a discussion of Raskolnikov, the nihilistic protagonist from Crime and Punishment, by making a logical parallel to Theodore Kaczynski, the modern-day Unabomber, whose manifesto, it turns out, resembled those of countless crazed anarchists and neo-Luddites before him.

Ozick's concern, not surprisingly, remains literary, and she digs deep into Dostoevsky's — not Kaczynski's — soul, finding "woeful pockets of obscurantist venom" within.

In The Impossibility of Being Kafka, she explores Kafka's haunting presence in modern culture and points out that while he wrote of a man turning into a bug, he died in 1924 and so "did not live to see human beings degraded to the status and condition of vermin eradicated by an insecticidal gas."

As evidenced in such refreshing first-person pieces as Lovesickness and How I Got Fired From My Summer Job, Ozick has a lighter side as well. Although she is often serious and cerebral as befits her subjects, she knows to inject levity into language and is delightfully adept at making fun of herself. Quarrel & Quandary is no less entertaining than her previous collections, Fame & Folly, and Metaphor & Memory.

With its variety of flavours, the American author's latest box of delectables should prove irresistible to the Jewish intellectual palate. (Knopf, $38)

A musical portrait of Israel's pioneers

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The songs of Israel's pioneers tell a fascinating story.

Decades before the State came into being in 1948, thousands of young men and women were already hard at work on its soil, draining swamps and irrigating deserts, planting fields and building settlements.

The story of these chalutzim will be recreated through song and narrative in Yiddish and Hebrew by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, ethno-musicologist Naomi Bell, and pianist Nadya Adler, on Jan. 14 at 3 p.m. at Holy Blossom Temple.

Bell says they will draw from musical treasures of the period, many of them little known, as they present Pioneers of Israel – A Musical Portrait. The program is open to the community.

The chalutzim had an ideal – to resettle and rebuild their ancient homeland by the labour of their own hands, Bell says, and "although they suffered hunger and thirst and malaria, these young pioneers never wavered from their purpose. Their dedication and sacrifice laid the foundation for the modern State of Israel."

Naomi Bell

The chalutzim gave voice to their feelings through music. They sang of their longing for Zion and their burning desire to rebuild it. In song after song, they celebrated the beauty of the landscape and their exultation in working on the soil.

The lecture/recital will address many issues faced by the chalutzim: Who were they? Why did they struggle and sacrifice to rebuild a land of desert and swamp? What were the ideals and historical influences that impelled them to resettle and rebuild the ancient land of Israel?

The songs, created in the early decades of this century, address sensitive matters such as parents pleading with their children not to go to Palestine and the struggle of the pioneers to make Hebrew the everyday language.

Bell, who approaches folksongs in Yiddish and Hebrew as social history, has collected and researched thousands of folksongs in both languages.

Maissner will sing Omrim Yesh'na Eretz by Saul Tchernikowsky, songs about working the land, Yerushalayim by Avigdor Hameiri, Adama by Mordechai Zaira, and many more pieces.

Raincoast has travel guides for eclectic or adventurous travellers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If you're an eclectic and/or adventurous traveller who ranges far and wide, Lonely Planet's reliable guidebooks, distributed in Canada by Raincoast Books, will certainly appeal to you.

The following guides, covering countries from the United States to Peru, are hot off the presses.

Hiking in the USA doesn't leave a stone unturned. From the Adirondacks to the Rocky Mountains, there are trails to be discovered. This guide book tells all.

The Inca Trail leads to legendary destinations such as Machu Picchu and Cuzco, and is ideal for hikers.

Hikers, bird watchers and nature lovers, devotees of ecotourism, will enjoy leafing through Watching Wild Life in Australia.

Georgia, Armenia & Azerbaijan zeroes in on three Caucasus republics rich in history and renowned for their hospitality and cuisine.

Mozambique, Ethiopia and Eritrea are back on the map again now that wars there have finally drawn to a close. These countries, known for their rugged vistas, unusual architecture and fine sand beaches, are profiled in two first edition books, Ethiopia, Eritrea & Djibouti and Mozambique.

Yemen, one of the least-known and most exotic countries in the Middle East, beckons tourists who don't mind basic amenities. In Yemen: The Unknown Arabia (Overlook Press), Tom Mackintosh-Smith skillfully explores its history, culture and landscape.

Concert at Koffler: The BJCC Koffler School of Music and Na'amat Canada present a duo piano concert featuring Alexander Tselyakov and Fabio Mastrangelo, playing music by Rachmaninoff, Chopin and Mozart.

The Russian-born Tselyakov is a highly regarded virtuoso who lives in Toronto and has toured all over the world. Mastrangelo, an Italian-born pianist and conductor, is founder and music director of the Virtuosi di Toronto. He has played with the St. Petersburg Philharmonic on two CDs due for upcoming release on the Naxos label.

Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., Jan. 20, 8 p.m. $25; seniors and students $18. For tickets, call Adrienne Cohen, 416-636-1880 ext. 228.

Zadie's Shoes: This Adam Pettle play opens at the Factory Theatre this week, refined after a week of preview performances. The Jewish protagonist is thrown into a conflict that forces him to weigh the nature of luck and the power of spiritual faith. A press release calls Zadie's Shoes a "hilarious and touching journey."

Runs Jan. 9 through Feb. 4. 125 Bathurst St. (corner of Adelaide). $20-$28. 416-504-9971.

The Holocaust in America: New York area poet Saul Bennett has published Harpo Marx at Prayer, a new work highlighted by a series of poems. Several of the poems address the paradoxical experience of an American child of the Holocaust era, aware that Jewish children in Europe his own age were being incinerated in the Nazi death camps. Other poems trace the experience of ancestors emigrating to America and their early years in the new land.

Bennett, a career executive on Madison Avenue, turned to poetry after the death of a daughter in 1994. Harpo Marx at Prayer, his second book, is published by Archer Books.

Photographer uses camera to help fight mental illness

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

West Wing* star Martin Sheen with photogapher Barry Shainbaum. Sheen wears handcuffs to symbolize his arrest, more than 60 times, for demonstrating for social and environmental causes. [Photo by Maria Stasi/Warner Bros.]

TORONTO — "I wouldn't wish what happened to me on anyone," says Barry Shainbaum of the mental illness that haunted him for some 15 years. But Shainbaum is also refreshingly forthright about his terrible experience with bipolar disorder, or manic depression. It took away some of his best years, but it did, he says, result in a labour of love – a project that has gone a long way toward helping him heal.

Shainbaum's long been a familiar figure on the local Jewish scene. He's often the photographer Jewish communal organizations call to document meetings, ribbon cuttings and receptions. His pictures have appeared in The CJN, the Toronto Star, and the Sun. These days, he's doing corporate work and portraits.

Shainbaum has spent two years lining up 44 disparate subjects around the world for a project called Hope and Heroes, which he hopes will result one day in a coffee-table style book of full-colour portraits of people who have made a difference.

As the working title suggests, Shainbaum's subjects are those who have inspired others with their compassion, integrity or bravery in the face of adversity. Through intimate portraits of subjects in their own surroundings, supported by short biographies, Shainbaum is hoping those who suffer from mental illness will be pointed toward greater awareness, whether of themselves or of a higher power.

"They're role models," explains the youthful-looking Shainbaum, who's 48. "Many of them have stuck their necks out, and triumphed. They may have been down at one point, but they bounced back."

The photographer has assembled an impressive array of heroes who have triumphed over various hurdles: former South African president Nelson Mandela; Nobel Peace Prize laureate and former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres; Canadian child labour activist Craig Kielburger; televangelists and motivational speakers Billy Graham and Robert Schuller; Mahatma Gandhi's peace-activist grandson, Arun; wheelchair athlete Rick Hansen; tobacco industry whistleblower Jeffrey Wigand; poet Maya Angelou; and the entire Grade 7 class of Wallins Elementary School in Kentucky, whose letter-writing campaign saved the peak of a local mountain from destruction at the hands of miners.

Each portrait is accompanied by thought-provoking questions such as "Define integrity" and "Who influenced you the most?" drawn up by broadcaster-turned-psychotherapist David Schatzky.

Shainbaum freely acknowledges that the project would never have come about were it not for his mental breakdown at the age of 21. With lithium and therapy, he managed to cobble his life back together, graduated with a degree in photographic arts from Ryerson Polytechnic University and opened his own studio in 1983.

Three years later, after taking a break from his medication, he fell apart again, losing his business and apartment. At one point, he was living in a flophouse filled with mentally ill indigents.

Then one day in 1988, almost as unexpectedly as it came, the illness left him.

"For me, it was a near-death experience," he recalls. "You look at the world differently when you survive something like this. So I began thinking, 'How can I make the world a better place?' This project was the answer."

Shainbaum has bounced back – like his subjects, but perhaps minus the headline-making heroism. He's now off medication and no longer in therapy. He's even-tempered and has a sense of humour. "My case is miraculous," he says.

And he takes nothing for granted.

"I now realize that whether you're a guy asleep on a park bench or a hero, we're all equal, and we have equal potential."

And he believes his experience will give hope to others with mental illness.

"It says to people with this illness, 'Look, here's a person who's overcome a lot.' So there's always hope."

Israel wants U.S. declaration to steer post-Clinton talks

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel has asked U.S. President Bill Clinton to make a "presidential declaration" which would summarize the Israeli-Palestinian peace process during his administration and serve as the basis of future negotiations after he leaves office.

The Israeli request comes in view of the fact that neither Israel nor the Palestinians believe that a framework agreement on a final status accord is possible before Clinton's term ends on January 20.

Shlomo Ben-Ami

"It [the declaration] would need to clarify precisely what is meant and leave nothing unclear, or open to contradictory interpretations. It must serve as a solid basis for dialogue and for reaching an agreement following the elections [in Israel]," Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami said Sunday.

Such a declaration would be based on the bridging proposals put forth by the American president to the two sides two weeks ago. Both sides accepted the proposals as the basis for a final status accord, albeit with reservations.

Ben-Ami said that any such declaration requires "an international gathering" which would grant the process legitimacy. However, the foreign minister said that he is opposed to a "photo-opportunity" which would make the Israeli public feel manipulated on the eve of prime ministerial elections set for Feb. 6.

Palestinian officials said on Sunday that they did not expect any breakthrough in the negotiations. They reiterated that any final status agreement must be based on UN Resolutions 242 and 338 as well as on General Assembly Resolution 194 on the right of return of refugees, which Israel has consistently rejected.

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said the Palestinians were awaiting an American response to their demand of international guarantees for any future Israeli-Palestinian agreement.

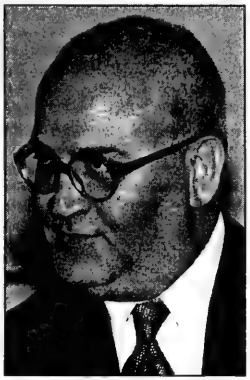
For his part, Clinton is not rushing to make the declaration Israeli is seeking. In spite of the little time he has left in the White House, he is weighing several options following a series of meetings with Palestinian and Israeli officials.

According to American sources, Clinton is working in close co-operation with officials of the incoming George W. Bush administration.

Among the options being considered are the following:

- An international conference with the participation of key players, such as the European Union, Russia, the UN and key Arab states. The conference would seek to formulate a document which would continue the negotiations toward a final status agreement.
- A presidential declaration, which could only be verbal, made in the presence of Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Ehud Barak or without them. The Americans prefer that the two sides endorse the declaration. However, they do not discount the possibility it would be issued solely on Clinton's initiative.
- A summit, in which the presidential declaration was made public, either in the framework of an international conference or a tripartite meeting of the three leaders. Arafat has expressed his willingness to attend such a summit. However, Barak has linked his participation to a drop in violence in the territories.
- Suspending the peace process if the differences among the parties were too deep to allow any of the options presented above. Clinton would then leave guidelines for officials of the Bush administration on ways to continue.

Americans weighing a number of policy objectives



Saeb Erekat

Israel is emphasizing that any advancement in the negotiations be directly linked to Palestinian efforts to substantially limit the violence in the territories.

To that end, American, Egyptian, Israeli and Palestinian officials held discussions Monday in Cairo on renewing security coordination between Israel and the PA, security which collapsed following the eruption of fighting in the territories in late September.

The head of the Shin Bet security services, Avi Dichter, and the head of Israel's team on issues of security in the negotiations, Maj.-Gen. Shlomo Yanai, represented Israel at the Cairo meeting. U.S. CIA Chief George Tenet, and Omar Suleiman, head of Egypt's Intelligence Service, co-hosted the meeting. Chief of Preventive Security in Gaza, Muhammad Dahlan, represented the Palestinians.

Israel's demand that the Palestinians act to lower the levels of violence in the territories was at the core of discussions between President Clinton and Israeli negotiator Gilead Sher, in Washington last week. Sher also presented the U.S. administration with a document of Israel's reservations to the Clinton proposals.

A senior diplomatic source in Jerusalem said that the Israeli document included alternative proposals on the issue of sovereignty over the Temple Mount. One idea involves a third party being in control of the contested site, possibly an international body.

Most of the reservations expressed by Israel in the document involve issues of security, and include demands for Israeli air force overflights of the Palestinian state and inspections of electronic transmissions emanating from Palestinian territory.

Jews might attack Barak warned

By BARUCH KRA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Extremist, messianic groups are posing security threats to the Temple Mount, former head of Shin Bet security service Carmi Gilon and former police commissioner Assaf Hefetz said in public letter to Prime Minister Ehud Barak last week.

"Calls made by rabbis," Gilon and Hefetz wrote, "are liable to be interpreted as sanctions given to an attack against the Temple Mount [by Jewish groups]." Rabbinical exhortations to "destroy the mosques and take vengeance for the murder of Binyamin Kahane," they added, make the Islamic sites on the Mount "prime targets for attacks by Jews."

The Gilon and Hefetz statement was sponsored by the Keshev Center for the Protection of Democracy in Israel, which was established after the assassination of prime minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995. To supplement the Gilon-Hefetz letter, the association added a report on the activities of extremist Temple Mount groups in recent years.

According to the report's findings, tens of thousands of people have been active in various Temple Mount groups. Though activities and ideologies supported by these groups differ, they are united by a commitment toward the eventual establishment of the Third Temple at sites on the Mount where the Al-Aksa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock stand today.

"Many of the members of these groups," the report adds, "have records of conviction for violent, ultra-nationalist activity; these include Kach members, and members of the Jewish underground."

In his letter, Keshev director Yizhar Be'er declared: "In the event of an attack against the holy sites, responsibility will be accorded to Israel, and destructive forces with apocalyptic-type intensity could arise. Irrespective of the contents of any deal on the Temple Mount, it is crucial that Israel cooperate with international officials while assuming responsibility for the holy places, even if there isn't a chance of signing an agreement right now."

Hoops star of the '40s and '50s was a real mentsch

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In his prime, Harry Mayzel was a tireless dynamo on the basketball court. Although at five-foot-nine, he was not a big man by today's standards, he was known for his doggedness, competitive spirit and court smarts. When combined with his physical skills, which included speed, endurance and the ability to outleap men a head taller than himself, he was one of the top players in Toronto in the 1940s and '50s.

Mayzel, 77, died recently after a battle with cancer.

In his youth, Mayzel captained the University of Toronto Blues, broke a near stranglehold on the Montreal-dominated Maccabiah basketball squad in 1950 and was good enough to earn a tryout with the NBA's Toronto Huskies when they came to town in 1946. In the '50s, he was a member of York Belting, a senior team that was a provincial powerhouse for years.

Mayzel was a fine athlete well into his '70s, competing with and beating much younger men on the tennis and squash courts. More than that, say a host of friends and family, he was an outstanding individual who went out of his way to help those less fortunate than himself.

"Everybody loved the guy," said longtime friend Stan Garden. "He was the sweetest guy to walk the earth...an angel. They don't make 'em any better than this man."

"He was very down to earth, very generous and very fond of children," said Beverley Chernos, whose late husband, Bernard, was a good friend of Mayzel.

Mayzel always helped those less fortunate than himself, was very generous and a "tremendous pillar of support" for the Shaarei Tzedec Synagogue, which he loved, said Joe Greenberg, a longtime friend.

One of his most endearing qualities was that he always stood up for the underdog, Greenberg said. In fact, that's how the two met in the 1930s. Mayzel chased off some young thugs who were accosting Greenberg and the two became friends then and there.

Mayzel stood up for the underdog

Mayzel came from a close-knit family and Harry loved his parents. His late father, Louis, was very charitable and set up a bursary to benefit the children of slain police officers. He also rented tuck shops, small convenience stores in apartment buildings, to blind businesspeople. Mayzel learned tzedakah, from his father, Greenberg said. Later in life, he sponsored his own scholarship prizes for the top students at the police academy. As a gesture of respect at his funeral, the police provided an honour guard and a police car escort from the chapel to the cemetery.

Mayzel, whose late cousin, Leonard, has a B'nai Brith chapter named after him, was an all-round athlete. "He excelled in rugby (football), squash, tennis and basketball," Greenberg said.

"He could outleap anybody a foot taller than him. If he decided to check you, you might as well sit down. He'd be on you like a second skin. He had phenomenal reflexes."

"He was dynamite. He was fast, smart, he was just unbelievable," Garden said.

Michael Mayzel, Harry's son, said his father's excellence was recognized by his hard-court opponents. Wayne State, an American college that hosted the U of T in numerous tournaments, named his father to its opponents' first all-star team, he said.

"His main mark was his conditioning. He could just run all day," Michael said. At squash or tennis, "he could run down anything. It was just amazing."

For the father-son pair, Sunday mornings were spent at the Bloor Y shooting hoops. When Michael was about seven, Harry introduced him to squash and tennis. Michael went on to a three-year career as a tennis pro.

Even when Harry reached his 70s, he had no problem playing three sets of tennis at a stretch. He didn't get warmed up until the second set, Michael said. When he was about 65, he finished third in a Canada-wide squash tournament.

He kept his squash game at a high level by frequently playing with Sharif Khan, the world champion for many years. Mayzel, a lawyer, often provided legal services for Khan and the two were good friends, Michael said.

Chernos remembers Mayzel as "a virtual member of the family and a surrogate uncle to my children." He taught them to play squash and tennis and "he endowed them with a knowledge and respect for sport.

"Harry always had hockey and baseball tickets and he loved to take kids to games. He did it for a million people," she said. "If you divided the world between givers and takers, he was a giver."

Mayzel is s survived by his companion, Sheila Clarke, his children Michael and Sandy, his sisters Betty Bloomfield and Shirley Silverberg and his mother Selma, who is 100 years old.

About Teens

Dear Karilani

Dear Karilani,

I've recently made some new friends at school and I like hanging with them. Unfortunately, they don't like my best friend. They are always making fun of her and encourage me not to be friends with her anymore. I want my new friends to like me but I also don't want to lose my best friend. What should I do?

Caught in the Middle

Dear Caught in the Middle,

There is no reason why you can't be friends with both your best friend and your new friends. Sometimes, when people are jealous of someone they tend to criticize them to make them look bad. Your new friends may be jealous of the relationship you and your best friend have and want to ruin it so they don't have to share you with anyone.

Talk to your friends and assure them that even though you and your best friend are close, you want to make time for them in your life too. Tell your new friends the reasons you like your best friend. Chances are they don't know her very well and when they hear what you have to say, their opinions about her might change.

Organize activities – maybe a bike ride or bowling – that you can do with both your best friend and your new friends. This will give everyone a chance to get to know each other. If those suggestions don't work, then it may be time for you to re-evaluate your friendship with these people. Do you really want to spend time with people who judge you like that? Nobody has the right to tell you who you can and can't be friends with.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

Mea Shearim hero

Risks life to defuse bomb near schoolyard

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A Jerusalem resident yesterday defused a bomb found in a garbage bin just moments before the explosive would have gone off.

The bomb had been placed near an elementary school in Jerusalem's Mea Shearim neighbourhood, and was apparently supposed to go off as the children were coming to classes.

The incident began at about 8 a.m., when neighbourhood resident Rivka Binat saw a young man, whom she thought was Palestinian, throw a knapsack into a garbage can. Binat called her brother, Moshe Bik, and told him the story, and he came and took the knapsack out of the trash.

"When I opened the knapsack, I saw something that looked to me like a bomb connected to a cellular phone," said Bik, a 36-year-old yeshiva student and father of five.

Bik ripped out the wires connecting the bomb to the cell phone and called the police. A few minutes later, the cell phone rang – apparently the signal that would have caused the bomb to explode.

It took bomb specialists two hours to dismantle the bomb, which consisted of two mortar shells. The police also began a search for the perpetrators, and two Palestinians found in the area were detained for questioning.

Bik said afterward that he was happy to have been instrumental in saving children's lives. But the police, he said, had mixed reactions to his action.

"Some told me I'm an idiot who endangered my own life and that of others in the area, while some praised me for the fact that in practice, I saved children's lives," Bik said.

Bouchard's principles lauded

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — What began with a brief, mildly worded press release from B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) urging the Parti Québécois (PQ) to think twice about accepting the nomination of Yves Michaud after he made sarcastic remarks about Jews in a radio interview, ended one month later with Premier Lucien Bouchard resigning, the PQ seriously divided, and the question of sovereignty in the air.

Although Bouchard had overriding political and family reasons for leaving, the "Michaud affair," most observers in the Jewish community agree, explains the timing and has allowed Bouchard to exit as a man of principle and honour.

Jews find themselves of two minds: surprised by and grateful for Bouchard's passionate expression of sympathy, and glad to see the person thought to have had the best chance of taking Quebec out of Canada leave the scene.

'Michaud affair' influenced decision

A drained-looking Bouchard said in his resignation speech that he had "no appetite" for a debate in Quebec about the Holocaust and the way ethnic communities vote.

"The Holocaust was the supreme crime, a systematic attempt to eliminate people… We should not hold it against the Jewish people for being traumatized by this," he said.

He said he could not understand how the desire for Quebec sovereignty had become "twisted" into a comparison with the suffering of the Jewish people. Nor could he abide intolerance and targeting of minorities because they vote against sovereignty.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Councillor Apologizes

VANCOUVER — A city councillor here has apologized for comparing drunk drivers to victims of Nazi persecution. George Puil was commenting on an idea by police requiring convicted drunk drivers to display a "D" on their car for a year. He likened the proposal to the Nazi practice of forcing Jews to wear the yellow Star of David on their clothes. Puil apologized to anyone in the Jewish community who was offended, explaining his point was that no one should be stigmatized.

Okanagan Web Site

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish community has unveiled its Web site: www.ojcc.net. The site touts a "heimish" atmosphere, a temperate climate, fast-growing economy and abundance of golf courses, ski hills and hiking trails.

ISRAEL

Barak Will Consult

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has promised Israel's chief rabbis that he would not make any decision to give up sovereignty over the Temple Mount without consulting them first.

Stronger Ties

JERUSALEM — Some 85 percent of Israelis support strengthening ties with the Diaspora, according to a new poll. The survey of 504 people was conducted by Gallup Israel and commissioned by Birthright Israel, which provides trips to Israel for young Jewish adults. The poll also showed that 80 percent of Israelis believe their government should invest in projects that bring Jews on a first trip to the Jewish state.

'Poison' Bombs

JERUSALEM — Two roadside bombs neutralized by Israeli troops last week in the Gaza Strip had been soaked in poison, Army Radio reported. The bombs apparently had been covered with an agricultural pesticide to boost their lethal effect.

WORLD

Bronfman Fellowships

NEW YORK — Applications are now available for the 2001 Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel. Now in their 15th year, the fellowships offer 26 students entering grade 12 the chance to spend five weeks in Israel this summer. Officials stress that merit, not financial need, is the standard for selection. Fellows will be chosen on the basis of character, intellectual interests, talents and leadership qualities. Students in the United States and Canada entering Grade 12 in the fall of 2001 are eligible. Applications are available from the Bronfman Youth Fellowship in Israel, 163 Delaware Ave., suite 102, Delmar, N.Y, U.S.A. 12504; by phone at 518-475-7212; fax, 518-475-7207 or by e-mail at yfi@bronfman.org. The Web site is www.bronfman.org. Completed applications must be postmarked no later than Jan. 31, 2001.

Pollard Papers

WASHINGTON — A federal judge here heard oral arguments last week on whether attorneys for convicted spy Jonathan Pollard should have access to classified portions of his court record. A former U.S. Navy intelligence analyst, Pollard was sentenced in 1987 to life imprisonment for spying for Israel.

FBI Raids Centre

NEW YORK — The FBI last week raided a Jewish community centre in Brooklyn believed to be the headquarters of Kach and Kahane Chai, extremist groups linked to the late Rabbi Meir Kahane. The raid came as Israeli officials warned of the possibility of vigilante violence following the recent slaying of Kahane's son, Binyamin Ze'ev Kahane, by Palestinian gunmen in the West Bank.

Officials Charged

PRAGUE — Czech state prosecutors have charged two former Communist party officials with abuse of power for allegedly protecting a one-time SS officer from prosecution for war crimes in the 1960s, according to Czech press reports. Werner Tutter, who died in 1983, had been implicated in the murder of dozens of civilians in Slovakia in 1944.

Presidential Medals

WASHINGTON — Rabbi Arthur Schneier and Marion Wiesel were among 28 Americans honoured by President Bill Clinton at a White House ceremony last week. Rabbi Schneier, founder of the New York-based Appeal of Conscience Foundation, was the first rabbi to receive the award. Wiesel, wife of Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel, was honoured for her efforts to combat hatred.

New Standards Would Require Get

NEW YORK — In what some say is a historic breakthrough for Orthodox women unable to divorce, several prominent Orthodox rabbis have endorsed standards for rabbinic courts.

The standards would require that a get, or Jewish divorce, be the first step in divorce proceedings. The recommendations are expected to make it easier for Orthodox women to navigate what many say is a labyrinthine system that favours men.

The standards are endorsed by the Orthodox Union and the Rabbinical Council of America, organizations that represent centrist Orthodox congregants and rabbis. They also have the support of more than 10 prominent rabbis who serve on or represent rabbinic courts in the United States.

The new standards, particularly the assurance that a get be provided before other divorce arrangements are made, will "clear up a very large percentage of the agunah problem," said Mattie Klein, director of L'Maan B'nos Yisrael International, a Brooklyn organization for agunot, or women denied a get.

Jerusalem petition urges unity, exposes divisions

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A statement designed to demonstrate support for Israeli sovereignty over a united Jerusalem has exposed deep divisions with the Canadian Jewish community.

Critics of the ad question the extent to which a Diaspora community should take a position that could be contrary to that of the democratically elected government of Israel. They also question the timing of the petition, which coincided with the hotly contested campaign in Israel prior to the Feb. 6 prime ministerial elections.

The statement is reproduced in an ad that appears in this week's CJN, as well as in the Suburban newspaper in Montreal and the Tribune, B'nai Brith Canada's house paper. It is signed by more than 150 prominent Jews from across Canada. It cites "the enduring and timeless link between Jerusalem and the Jewish people," and it states that "only a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty" has guaranteed freedom of worship for all faiths.

Kurt Rothschild, one of the architects of the statement, told The CJN the document merely confirms what every Israeli government, including the government of Ehud Barak, has stated since Jerusalem was unified under Israeli sovereignty following the1967 Six Day War.

"Jerusalem is uniquely tied not only to Israel but to the world Jewish community throughout history," he said. "We therefore have a very great stake particularly in the Temple Mount, in not giving away its sovereignty to another people. Every Israeli government has considered Jerusalem to be the capital of Israel and we are merely reiterating in a non-political way what every government, including Barak's, has stated – that Israel wouldn't turn over sovereignty over the Temple Mount."

More than 150 signatures

Thomas Hecht, the other architect of the document, said the petition "expresses the view of the Jewish leadership and reflects the view of the large majority of Jews.

"We consider Jerusalem the heartbeat of the Jewish people and you don't remove the heart of the Jewish people."

Hecht said the statement is "sufficiently apolitical for people from all aspects of Jewish life to sign on."

Rothschild stated that all those who signed did so in their personal capacities and not as representatives of particular organizations. Rothschild serves as president of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), and Hecht is chair of the Quebec wing of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm on Israel.

The list of those who signed includes business people, rabbis, community activists and academics. Among the names on the document are: Israel (Izzy) Asper, Phillip and Albert Reichmann, Dorothy Reitman, Gerald Schwartz, Michael Serruya and Michael Bregman; Ariela Cotler, wife of Montreal MP Irwin Cotler, Senator Sheila Finestone, Robert Libman, mayor of Cote St. Luc and a chair of B'nai Brith in Quebec, and Gerry Weiner.

Conspicuous by their absences, however, are the names of Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; CIC chair Joseph Wilder; and B'nai Brith Canada president Lawrence Hart. Ronen and Wilder confirmed they had been asked to add their names to the document, and though they sympathized with the views it expressed, they declined.

By signing, it would appear Congress or the CIC, as organizations, supported the document, they said.

"In doing that, we might be putting ourselves in contradiction to the policy of the government of Israel," Ronen said. Release of the document in the midst of the Israeli election campaign might give the appearance that Canadian Jews were taking sides in the vote, he added.

'Oh how fine a man'

From the editor's desk

At any other time or place in the last century, the young man on the motorcycle in the accompanying photograph — vigorous, dashing, handsome — might have been heading for that one great "Easy Rider-ish" adventure of his life, like so many other young men in their early 20s at the peaks of their strengths and their curiosities about the wider world and their places in it.

Yet two details in the photo immediately reveal this rider is no hellion seeking fun or adventure: the army uniform he is wearing, in this case Polish, and the expression in his eyes — defiant, yet at the same time, paradoxically, deeply empathetic.

The rider was Avraham Feldberg, or as he was later to become known, Johnny "Jahnek" Fields.

The time was 1946 or 1947; the place was the still smouldering, ashen chaos of post-war eastern Europe.

Feldberg was, by then, a highly reputed, daring fighter of the Nazis and their accomplices. In 1941, at the age of 17, he joined the Polish underground, his steel-blue eyes both a warning of his singular determination and an entry into the inner sanctum of a new collegium of resistance fighters.

He fought the Nazis with every meagre weapon at his disposal, but mostly with his guile and the steadfast resolve that evil must not triumph.

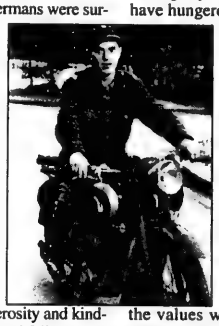
From the relative "safety" of his hiding place in the middle of April 1943, he slipped back into the ghetto of Warsaw to find his mother. (His father had died some 17 years earlier.) But his mother was no longer there; she had been shipped to Treblinka days before. Nevertheless, Feldberg remained to join in the final battle he knew was imminent.

Merely days later, on the morning of the eve of Pesach, the battle began.

In his own typically modest, understated words, written many years later to the Consul General of Poland in Toronto, he described that fateful, historic first day of fighting in the ghetto.

"I was awakened with the news that the Germans had surrounded the ghetto. I took my weapon and joined the group that was led by "Wlodek." We had a few molotov cocktails, three flares and some hand grenades. Most of the group had no weapons.

"We assembled at the intersection of Gestej and Okopej Streets. Early in the morning the Germans attacked the main entrance gate. When they approached our position, we threw our grenades and our molotovs, then opened fire with the weapons we had. The Germans were surprised. They retreated, leaving behind materiel and several dead soldiers. We felt fortunate to collect the weapons they had abandoned."



Johnny and his fellow freedom fighters held out longer against the Germans than did any of the regular armies of the countries of occupied Europe.

Johnny's extreme bravery in battle, along with his uncommon generosity and kindness towards colleagues and fellow Jews became the stuff of legend. He was known, during one incident, to endanger his own life to enable an old man, breathing his last breaths, to do so in dignity, not as a forgotten, crumpled over piece of humankind in the hovel of garbage and refuse and death.

Eventually, the Polish government formally acknowledged his rare valour. He was decorated several times for his heroism and example.

After the war, the old fighter was still generous and kind, helping where he could, the many others, who, refugees like him, had also settled in Canada.

One such other refugee in particular, who had also worn a Polish uniform in the war and who relied on his skill as a tailor to help rebuild his post-war life, always remarked how "fine a man" Johnny Fields was.

Nothing exemplified Johnny Fields better than the hymnal rallying cry of the Jewish partisan written by Hershel Glick during the war:

"Never say that there is only death for you/Though leaden skies may be concealing days of blue/Because the hour we have hungered for is near/As we march the earth shall tremble: We Are Here!"

"We Are Here" was the unshakable personal credo by which Johnny Fields lived all the days of his life. He passed away last month sometime after we lit the third candle of Chanukah. His children and his friends referred to him as one of Israel's modern giborim, a hero, a Macabbee for our time.

Johnny's soul burnished the values we treasure most dearly in human beings and as his grieving son said of him, his "nobility of spirit," like the candles in the chanukiah in every Jewish household, "shone like a beacon in the darkest of nights."

May the memory of Johnny Fields be for a blessing.

Rally planned to support captive Israelis

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A community rally in support of four captive Israelis is planned for noon, Jan. 21 at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The Israelis are being held by Hezbollah, inside Lebanon, "in flagrant violation of international law," says Lisa Armony, public affairs and communications director of Canada Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Three soldiers – Benny Avraham, Omar Souad and Adi Avitan, – were captured on Oct. 7 while on routine patrol within Israel, when Hezbollah forces crossed the border illegally. Avitan's brother Eyal, 24, is planning to come to Toronto to address the rally.

Planned for January 21

One week later, Israeli businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum was kidnapped while on a business trip in Europe. This is the first time that Hezbollah has captured an Israeli outside of Israel or Lebanon, says Armony.

While there has been some intervention by the Canadian, American, Russian, Austrian and – most prominently – German governments on the Israelis' behalf, to date their physical condition is unknown, she says.

There are unconfirmed reports that the IDF found blood at the site where the soldiers were captured, and UNIFIL, the UN force inside Lebanon, said they found blood in the soldier's truck, but they don't know the extent of their injuries, she says.

"There as been no official confirmation of their condition because the International Red Cross has been denied access to them," says Armony.

Organizers are hoping for a large turnout at the rally in order to draw attention to this matter, she says. "This is one of the forgotten issues in the recent crisis in Israel.

"We want to express our solidarity with their families and we want it put on the agenda of world leaders so they will intervene," says Armony.

A petition addressed to Kofi Annan, secretary-general of the United Nations; president-elect George W. Bush; Prime Minister Jean Chrétien; and Jakob Kellenberg, president of the International Committee of the Red Cross, has been circulated. It will also be distributed before the rally.

This past Shabbat, says Armony, rabbis across the city were to have spoken to their congregations about the matter.

The rally is sponsored by ARZA; Board of Jewish Education; B'nai Brith Canada; Canada-Israel Committee; Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; Canadian Zionist Federation; Jewish Agency for Israel; Jewish National Fund; Mercaz; Mizrachi; UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto; and Zionist Youth Movement.

Community urged to take part in mission to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two IDF officers on a North American speaking tour have urged the Toronto Jewish community to take part in the upcoming national Canadian solidarity mission to Israel.

At a recent meeting sponsored by UJA FEDERATION and United Israel Appeal, joint organizers of the mission, Avital Leubovich and Ariel Rotman appealed to Torontonians to show their support for Israel by taking part in the Feb. 13-18 trip.

Leubovich, 29, head of the visits and lecture section in the IDF spokesperson unit, said that part of her job is to coordinate civilian visits to army bases around the country.

"Since August, the number of visitors has dropped dramatically. This is unfortunate because in reality, we do go on with our lives. Life goes on even though the mood is not happy. We have no choice but to make the best of it."

Leubovich, whose husband is a battalion commander in the Israel Air Force currently serving in the Bethlehem area, said it was difficult to leave her nine-month-old baby, "but it is important that I convey this message."

When people come from Canada, it "warms the hearts of our people. We are not talking about money, we are talking about emotions."

Leubovich's husband spends every day of his life in the line of fire, she said, "and I am on 24-hour a day alert on the pager. It is very frightening, but by coming you share my way of life. That is something that is very meaningful."

Rotman, 25, a deputy battalion commander, says that it is important for soldiers to see people coming to the country.

"When soldiers are guarding areas of the country, and see people coming from abroad, they feel as if they are not alone. It is very tough on the soldiers when they see that tourism has dropped."

Norman Godfrey, mission chair and vice-chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, who went on his first mission in 1992, said the trip is an opportunity to meet people that visitors to Israel would otherwise not come in contact with.

"We will be arriving a week after the elections, so we will have a chance to talk with political analysts. It is an intense mission; every minute will be valuable."

It is a vital time to show our support, he said. "Solidarity is the most positive expression we can make."

Joseph Shier, who went to Israel on a mission in December, said that his tour guide had not worked in three months prior to that tour. "It is important for everyone that you are there.

"[When you arrive in the country], you will see that you will become part of it. You will experience life like the [Israelis] do. Life in Israel is still going on. Olim are arriving at the rate of 1,000 a week."

A draft of the mission itinerary includes a visit to Kiryat Moshe to explore the current challenges facing Ethiopian olim, a full day of programming in the north and a possible visit to the IDF dog tracking unit, security briefing along the Lebanese border, dinner at the Canada Centre in Metulla and a Shabbat walking tour of Jerusalem.

Canada offers to open doors to Palestinians

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Reports that Canada has made a "secret" offer to accept potentially thousands of Palestinian refugees does mean this country has chosen sides in the Middle East dispute, says the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC).

It's "narrow" to think the offer means Canada has abandoned its long-held neutrality in the region or that it has undermined Palestinians' claims to their right of return to Israel, says Robert Ritter, executive director of the CIC.

"Canada is showing leadership [with its offer]," Ritter told The CJN. "It's an extension of the fact that Canada holds the gavel at the Refugee Working Group."

The group is one of five multilateral working groups set up by the international community after the Gulf War. Canada has chaired the committee that has been examining the plight of Palestinian refugees, which has become one of the thorniest final-status issues in Mideast peace negotiations.

Ritter said the refugees would not be coerced into coming to Canada.

"No one is forcing them to come. My attitude is to let them have that option. It's important for refugees to have that option."

The gesture by Canada, he said, is part of longstanding Canadian tradition.

Published reports last week stated that Canada made the "dramatic" offer over the holiday period in a series of telephone calls involving Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley, and his counterparts in Israel and the Palestinian Authority, as well as U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

On Christmas Day, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien reportedly telephoned Palestinian president Yasser Arafat to discuss the peace process, although the refugee issue was apparently not raised.

In an interview with the Toronto Star, Manley said Canada is "prepared to receive [Palestinian] refugees." The paper added that if the resettlement of Palestinians would come to pass, it would be a mass movement and would far exceed the trickle of Palestinian refugee claimants who seek asylum here every year.

The Canadian Council for Refugees said it was realistic for Canada to accept up to 10,000 Palestinians a year.

This was not the first time the issue was raised. During his visit to the Mideast last April, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak reportedly asked Chrétien to accept up to 15,000 Palestinian refugees. But Chrétien denied later reports that Canada would accept them.

Neither was Canada's offer said to be secret. As the chair of the refugee talks, Canada has often raised the issue of taking in Palestinian refugees, both internally and with other countries.

Last week, Barak's chief of staff, Gilad Sher, was quoted as saying Canada "has opened the door to resolving one of the toughest issues that relates to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

But many Palestinian leaders in the region were furious that Canada was undermining their bid to win the right of refugees to return to their pre-1948 and pre-1967 homes in Israel.

Other detractors said that with its offer, Canada has chosen sides in the dispute because it was pre-determining the outcome of final peace talks.

The Reuters news agency last week said that given rising Palestinian opposition to the plan, "it is questionable at best whether Canada would be called on to made good on the reported offer."

Derik Hogdson, a spokesperson for Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan, said the matter "is a Foreign Affairs issue." He said Caplan's department continually makes contingency plans, and "stands ready to help if called on."

Bonnie Osoff-Bultz, national president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) wondered whether the Palestinian newcomers would be legitimate refugees, as defined by the United Nations and other international covenants.

To prove their claim, refugees in Canada have to show they have a "well-founded fear of persecution" in their homeland or last place of residence.

Osoff-Bultz said Canada's generosity should be extended to "legitimate" refugee claimants around the world.

Over the decades, there has been wide disagreement on the number of Palestinian refugees. The UN puts the figure at 3.5 million; Israel estimates the total is around two million, while Palestinians have said the number is over five million.

Following the 1948 War of Independence, 726,000 Palestinians became refugees. Only 156,000 remained in Israel proper.

Ritter points out that Israel has resettled 70,000 Palestinian refugees.

James Kafieh, a former executive director of the Canadian-Arab Federation and now head of Canadians for the Palestinian Right of Return, slammed Canada's offer as an attempt at an end run around Palestinians' quest to return to present-day Israel.

He warned that the possible influx of thousands of Palestinians to this country would only strengthen their claims, as well as those of the roughly 40,000 Palestinians already here, to the right of return to Israel.

THE HOLOCAUST WALL OF REMEMBRANCE

"Unto Every Person There is a Name"

To immortalize the precious souls who perished in the Holocaust, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is building a Wall of Remembrance at the Holocaust Memorial in Earl Bales Park.

This Wall of Remembrance will perpetuate the names of the Jewish men, women and children murdered in the Holocaust, and return to them their identities, which they were so brutally robbed of in death.

The names of our loved ones who have no known graves will be carved in black granite to give permanent remembrance to those whose lives were lost during the Holocaust.

Survivors of the Holocaust who have since passed away may also be memorialized on the Wall in a separate section.

Please join us in this sacred project to perpetuate the memory of our loved ones, so that future generations will never forget, and will know that "Unto Every Person There is a Name".

Shining again perhaps, but on a new horizon

Like the sun that rises every day, politicians dominate the horizon, sometimes even shining brightly. Inevitably though, like the sun, their day must also set. Thus, last week did the Parti Québécois leadership of Lucien Bouchard effectively come to an end and with it, his premiership of the province of Quebec.

In an emotional, plain-speaking, reflective though hard-hitting address at the National Assembly last week, Premier Bouchard announced his intention to leave public life. True to form, his remarks evoked a swirl of different emotions.

For the Jewish community, especially, the resignation was bittersweet.

The premier had proven himself to be as staunch an ally against the forces of intolerance as he was a foe, alas, against the forces of renewed federalism.

The "Michaud Affair" was not the reason for his departure, but it certainly was a key factor in his decision about his continued role with the party. "I still don't understand how the linguistic debate turned into a comparative quantification of the suffering of the Jewish people," Bouchard poignantly proclaimed.

At this stage in his life, did he want to do battle with federalists, even as he would have had to do more wrenching battle with the more radical members of his own party? He decided not to.

Less an enigmatic person than one of strong, turbulent and openly displayed emotions, Bouchard demonstrated immovable principle against the barrage of displeasure levelled against him from Yves Michaud's supporters. And for this resolve, The CJN, indeed all Canadians and Quebecers trying to build an inclusive, tolerant society, praised him.

The premier's laudable resolve against the Michaud faction however, cannot ameliorate his frequent resort to a brooding, mercurial, at times even demagogic manner in public debate. Nor were his many angry but essentially dubious invocations of the principles of democracy, when he expounded upon Quebec's right to separate from Canada, consistent with the high principle he manifested so admirably in other matters. Bouchard's notions of democracy strangely paid little heed to the need for democracy's indispensible attachment to the rule of law.

Undoubtedly, his sun will shine again one day, but on a new, non-political horizon.

We wish him and his family good health and good fortune in all their endeavours, save and except the dismantling of Canada.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Responding to Syrtash - 1

I was surprised with the manner in which John Syrtash characterized my alleged remarks about Stockwell Day during the recent federal election campaign ("Liberal scare tactics distracted voters," The CJN, Jan. 11).

According to Mr. Syrtash, I "slammed" Stockwell Day, "for failing to ask [notorious lawyer for Holocaust deniers] Doug Christie, to cancel a pro-Day rally..."

In fact, Mr. Syrtash took out of context a piece from an article written in the Globe and Mail by Stevie Cameron. The only quote attributed to me in Ms. Cameron's article is the following: "Is there a news release distancing himself from Mr. Christie?"

This is a far cry from Mr. Syrtash's depiction of me "slamming" Mr. Day. One must wonder what Mr. Syrtash's motivation was to use such hyperbole. Then again, neither Mr. Syrtash nor The CJN let it be known that during the federal election John Syrtash was a campaign official for Canadian Alliance candidate Robert Goldin.

Incidentally, I found it intriguing that Mr. Syrtash also failed to note that CJC National President Moshe Ronen and Ontario regional Chair Keith Landy were the only Jewish leaders to publicly recognize Mr. Day's support of Israel during the federal election.

Responding to Syrtash - 2

John Syrtash articulates his support for Alliance as opposed to the Liberals but his opinion doesn't add anything to "understanding" the Jewish vote. Our political history in the Diaspora reveals that Jews were invariably safer in countries ruled by centrist social democrat governments without any right or left fundamentalist leanings.

No one can speak for all Jews, but as a Canadian humanist Jew, I will choose my government based on its record of policies and philosophies regarding human rights and fiscal matters. That's what I believe is best for me, for Jews and for all Canadians. I never expect all government decisions to be in accord with my views and desires.

I abhor Canada's UN position regarding Israel, not because I'm a Jew, but because it was uninformed and unethical.

I also vehemently oppose governmental support for any religious education, including ours. Making funding Jewish education a federal issue is inappropriate and distracts voters from reality. Our lobbying and educating work should be at the provincial level where the law is made and administered.

Arab refugees - 52 years ago

Does anything in the Middle East ever change?

For a research project on Canadian Jewish attitudes towards the Soviet project to establish a Jewish republic in the Birobidzhan region of the Soviet far east, I've been reading back issues of the Vochenblat, a now-defunct weekly Yiddish-language newspaper which was the organ of the Jewish pro-Communist sympathizers in Canada. In 1948, the USSR (temporarily) supported the establishment of the new State of Israel, and so, therefore, did this periodical. CJN readers might be interested in an item I came across on the English back page (p. 8) of the Aug. 19, 1948, issue.

In the weekly column "Between the Lines," written by Abraham Arnold, the noted Jewish Canadian journalist (who is still active in the community), there is reference to a visit made to the new State of Israel by Vochenblat editor Joshua Gershman. In the column, Arnold quotes Gershman as stating that "the number of Arab refugees from Israel is being consciously increased beyond its real figure by those circles that want to use the refugee question as a weapon against the Jewish state." This was more than 52 years ago! Talk of "Plus ça change..."!

Questioning Kirshner's analysis

It is incredible that after all the anti-Jewish violence, hatemongering and extremism orchestrated by Yasser Arafat against Israel, Sheldon Kirshner urges a treaty with Arafat to end the violence (The CJN, Jan. 4). There are some in Israel who agree, but they are a tiny minority on the extreme left.

Even rational leftists have noticed that the more Israel has given away, the more hate the Arabs have demonstrated. Before Oslo, Arabs respected Israel's strength and determination. Oslo has so weakened Israel that now Arabs openly consider their military options.

Rational leftists also now realize that Arafat is using fraudulent peace talks to launch a war against Israel. Prominent members of the left have come out against the division of Jerusalem and the influx of four million Arabs into the country.

How is Kirshner's "peace" treaty with Arafat going to solve Arafat's insistence on sovereignty over Jerusalem and on the refugees' right of return?

Black is Israel's friend

I am writing with regard to the article "Post Election Musings" by Ron Csillag (The CJN, Dec. 21).

Conrad Black and his family have always shown friendship to Jews and Israel. Black did not buy the Jerusalem Post many years ago because he was mad at Jean Chrétien.

Mr. Csillag states that the prime minister himself tried to placate the Jewish community. It did not change the Liberals' attack on Israel in the UN. It is quite obvious that Mr. Chrétien and Mr. Manley were trying to salvage some Toronto seats from a Jewish backlash. It is naive to state otherwise.

Conrad Black and the National Post are the best Canadian friends that the Jews and Israel have in the media. At a time when we should recognize who our friends are, and to thank them for their support, you publish a scurrilous article about them in your newspaper.

Now that the election is over, does anyone think that the Liberals will support Israel in the UN?

My wife and I are disappointed in The CJN.

Perspectives

Yerushalayim and Al-Quds

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

An abridged version of this essay appeared in The CJN three years ago. In light of recent events, the author expanded upon her original essay and we gladly publish this expanded version. The following is the first of two parts.

Importance of Jerusalem for the Jews

Ever since King David captured it from the Jebusites in the 10th century BCE, Jerusalem has been the most coveted city in the world. In medieval maps, Jerusalem is in the centre of the universe and it is called Umbilicus Mundi: Navel of the world.

David brought the Ark of Law, the mobile shrine and sanctuary of the Hebrews' God, the holiest religious and national symbol of his people, to Jerusalem, thus making the city not only his political and military capital but also the spiritual and religious centre of the Hebrews. He irreversibly linked Jerusalem to the Jewish religion, people and state, and sang his love and devotion to it in moving verses:

If I forget you, O Jerusalem,
let my right hand wither...
If I do not remember you,
If I do not set Jerusalem

He temporarily placed the Ark of Law in a nomad's tent and it was his son, King Solomon who, in the fourth year of his reign, was granted the supreme privilege to build the Temple according to God's orders.

Although small, the Temple took seven years to complete and became celebrated throughout the Near East for its beauty and splendor. Its remaining Western Wall, embellished by Herod and Saladin hundreds of years later, is today the most sacred place on earth for Jews.

Ever since King Solomon, the Temple, Jerusalem and Mount Zion have come to represent for the Jews the Divine source of their religion and the enduring symbol of their national reality, despite their physical separation from it during the two millennia of exile.

It is from Jerusalem that the biblical prophets spread their wisdom all over the world, replacing the idolatrous pagan way of life with monotheism, the concept of good and evil, brotherly love and the rule of law, thus irreversibly changing humanity. As Isaiah exclaimed: "For out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

The three monotheistic religions have relentlessly fought over the Holy City. However, only the Jews have always kept it at the centre of their daily prayers and wishes for redemption. Only they wrote poems and sang songs about it, and only they braved danger, hunger, disease and death just to "behold Jerusalem."

In Israel and in their various countries of exile, Jews have always oriented their synagogues towards Jerusalem. Among no other nation can we find a Shmuel Hanagid who preferred to be in the ruins of the Temple rather than "to live in my palaces and to dominate over all creatures of this earth" or a Yehuda Halevi who, 21 centuries after Solomon, wrote such moving verses:

My heart is in the east and I in the uttermost west.
How can I find savour in food? How can it be sweet to me?
How light in my eyes to leave the bounty of Spain!
How bright in my eyes the dust of the Shrine again!

In The Kuzari, Yehuda Halevi described the special place held by Jerusalem in the hearts and theology of all Jews. Halevi explained to the king of the Khazars that the enduring faith and strength of the Jewish people are God-given and their source is the prophecy which will be realized when the Jews live in the Land of Israel, especially Jerusalem, speaking Hebrew in freedom and dignity. The king asked: "But are you not like a dead body now?" The Jew answered: "Not dead, but dangerously ill, yet with a firm faith that the great miracle will happen." The miracle Halevi meant was the end of exile and the ingathering of the Jews in Jerusalem and the land of Israel.

There are endless such examples throughout their history, of the Jews' love for and sanctification of the city. Far from attenuating their love for Jerusalem, exile increased it. To behold it at least once in their life was regarded as almost a religious duty by the Jews.

Ever since biblical times, whenever they were physically and financially able, Jews living in Israel made the pilgrimage to the Western Wall for one or more of the three annual pilgrim festivals: Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot. And the Diaspora Jews, especially those living in Muslim lands – because it was geographically possible for them to walk to Jerusalem – often undertook this adventurous trip, despite the hardships and the dangers which prevented many of them from reaching their much cherished destination.

As many as a reported 300,000 Israelis rallied last week to protest U.S. President Bill Clinton's proposal to share sovereignty of Jerusalem.

Jews all over the world have traditionally felt responsible for the welfare of the Jewish community of Jerusalem, which has been heavily dependent upon charitable support throughout much of the Middle Ages and up to early modern times. There is no parallel in the history of any other city to this unflinching mystic bond that neither time nor space could ever dim.

Brief historical synopsis

Many nations came, conquered and left Jerusalem. On the 9th of Av 586 BCE, four centuries after Jerusalem became Israel's capital, Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon, captured it, destroyed the Temple and exiled the Jews, who, in 538, were allowed to return by Cyrus, emperor of Persia. Cyrus gave orders to rebuild the Temple at government expense and demanded that the Jews remaining behind should equip the returning exiles "with silver and with gold, and with goods and with beasts, beside the freewill-offering for the house of God which is in Jerusalem" (Ezra 1:4).

The Second Temple was completed in 515 BCE. Alexander of Macedonia defeated the Persians in 332 BCE, respected the holiness of Jerusalem and ordered his soldiers not to destroy or desecrate the Temple. In 198 BCE, Antiochus III conquered Jerusalem and looted the holy treasures of the Temple which he called temple of Zeus. On the 9th of Av 70 CE, Titus captured Jerusalem, butchered thousands of men, women and children, set the Temple on fire, replaced it with a temple for Jupiter, had the city totally razed and had coins inscribed with "Judea Capta."

Bar Kochba led the War of Freedom from 132 to 135 and Jerusalem became once again the capital of the Jews, but only for three years. In 135, the Roman Emperor Hadrian destroyed it completely and to eradicate any vestige of a Jewish presence, called it Aelia Capitolina (Aelius was his family name, and Capitoline Jupiter was the name of a Roman god). On pain of death, he forbade Jews, even those converted to Christianity, to approach within sight of the Holy City.

Christians became interested in Jerusalem only in the fourth century and called it Hierosolyma. The very pious Queen Helena, mother of the Roman Emperor Constantine, went to Jerusalem in 326 in order to visit the sites traditionally associated with Jesus. She ordered the building of several churches, most notably the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Thirteen centuries after the Jews started the pilgrimage tradition, Christian pilgrims, attracted by the religious symbolism of these buildings, flocked to Jerusalem from all over the world.

By the end of the fourth century, Jerusalem became an exclusively Christian city and the Jews, barred from it, were living mostly in Galilee.

In 614, the Persians, helped by the Jews of Galilee, took Jerusalem after a siege of 20 days, but in 629, the Byzantine Emperor Heraclius, defeated them and reconquered the city.

In 638, the Muslims captured it. In 1099, the Crusaders started their holy war in order to take Jerusalem back from the Muslims. They massacred Jews and Muslims alike and created the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, from which they barred Jews and Muslims.

The Crusaders turned the Dome of the Rock into a church and called it Templum Domini. A Kurdish officer Saladin defeated the Crusaders in 1187, reconquered Jerusalem and removed all signs of Christian occupation.

In 1517, the Ottomans conquered the city and kept it for four centuries. Suleiman the Magnificent restored it and built new walls around it that surpassed the old Herodian walls.

In 1917, the British conquered Jerusalem which, in 1949, became, once again, the capital of the newly created State of Israel. In 1967, Jerusalem was reunited.

Part 2 of this essay will appear in next week's issue.

Protect the earth by doing

It will be no news to my readers that the chief difference between Judaism and Christianity lies in the importance placed on doing and believing. Christianity is a structure that emphasizes faith, and Judaism a system that lays stress on mitzvot.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

You are no doubt aware that the recent international conference dealing with climate change came to an inglorious end. The politicians assembled could not agree on a common goal. Perhaps we ought to begin emphasizing that the prime responsibility for improving our environment lies with each one of us individually. I therefore present herewith a brief catalogue of personal opportunities. Even if we pay attention to but a few and incorporate them into our lifestyle, we will have made a beginning and will have contributed to bettering the world. A full catalogue – far exceeding the items listed below – was recently published by the World Federalists of Canada.

- Audit your own modes of transportation. Walk or bike, take public transit and reduce your dependency on the private car. If you need a car, drive the most fuel-efficient model and keep it in peak running condition.
- Heat your home with natural gas or combination systems that use solar power. Insulate, making sure to avoid toxic insulation materials and taking extra care in old houses. Install energy-efficient light bulbs. Turn the air conditioning down or off.
- Refrain from buying the latest motor-driven gadget, and retire needless appliances. Replace worn appliances with energy-efficient ones, and let manufacturers know you are purchasing on that basis.
- Cut your lawn with a hand mower, or better still, replace the lawn with a garden. Plant trees. If you own rural property that is not used for farmland, plant trees on it. If you live or work in a flat-roofed building, get a rooftop garden planted.
- Buy locally-produced food in season. Consider the distance it takes for a product to travel to you before buying.
- Separate your waste – paper and cardboard; glass, aluminum and plastic containers; food scraps – and recycle or compost them. Reduce your waste of recyclables, including water.

I am sure that each of you can do something in this vital endeavour. Judaism teaches that we are stewards of the earth. We have to guard and protect it. The few who will start doing something may move others to do something, too.

A tale of two cities

This time Israeli traffic is moving in the opposite direction. To be sure, it's no migration of the masses, but in recent weeks the Big Orange on the coast has proven especially alluring to people in the Holy City. It's a role reversal of sorts from the last time Israel was under siege.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Exactly 10 years ago this month, thousands of Tel Aviv residents hightailed it out of town after coming under Iraqi rocket attacks during the Gulf War.

With each successive Scud missile that slammed into the city, the exodus intensified. Many people headed to Jerusalem for safety.

In the current conflict with the Palestinians, the tables have turned, with Jerusalem in the line of fire while Tel Aviv has largely escaped the violence. For those in the Jerusalem area, (especially in the embattled neighbourhood of Gilo), the past 3½ months have been particularly unsettling due to the frequent rioting, shooting attacks and occasional bombings – to say nothing about the debate over the city's future.

Despite their relative proximity to each other, Jerusalem and Tel Aviv are worlds apart.

Even during more peaceful times, Tel Aviv has always had a special appeal to residents of the capital. As Israel's centre for business, arts, entertainment, fashion and gastronomy, Tel Aviv offers visitors fabulous diversions and a feeling of being "somewhere else," almost as if it were in another country.

Lately, more Jerusalemites than usual have been making the 50-minute drive to Tel Aviv for a much needed change of scenery. Normally, people in Jerusalem seeking a getaway have many options. But since late September, Palestinian attacks on drivers in the Jerusalem vicinity have made several main roads off-limits for most Israelis. For now, at least, the main highway to Tel Aviv remains safe.

A couple of weeks ago, I took my family to Tel Aviv for a few days. It didn't hurt that we were guests of the Dan Hotel which, like every hotel in the country, is hurting terribly as a result of recent events. With its current occupancy rate averaging barely 30 percent, the Dan was eager for any publicity that might help bring back sorely missed tourists.

Since the Palestinian uprising erupted, Israel's tourist industry has taken a beating, suffering massive cancellations by foreign tourists and, to a lesser degree, by Israelis. Until the autumn, Israel was on track for a record year in tourism with more than three million visitors expected. Now it's ailing. In November, for example, tourism arrivals plummeted 58 percent compared to a year earlier.

And the crisis is not over yet. This month, the Association of Travel and Tourist Agencies predicted that tourism to Israel this year will drop by 50 percent compared to 2000. It also said the economic consequences of the current situation could be more severe and long lasting than those caused by the Gulf War.

During our stay, Tel Aviv showed few outward signs of the present crisis. In contrast to Jerusalem, it's upbeat and exudes an exuberance reflecting its more hedonistic approach to life.

Walking through the streets of the city we were aware of an urban texture very different from Jerusalem. The atmosphere is more relaxed, more varied, more sensual than the capital. The recent proliferation of cafes and all kinds of eateries further enhances the city's ambience.

It was fun being tourists in Tel Aviv. With its central, beachfront location and beautiful rooms, the Dan was a delight deserving of the plug they hoped to get for their hospitality. We began our tour at the Azrieli Center's observation gallery, savouring its breathtaking view of the entire city from 50 floors up. Back on the ground, the Tel Aviv Museum of Art, hosting several spectacular exhibitions, provided another kind of feast for the eyes. In the old harbour quarter of Jaffa, we enjoyed the Ilana Goor Museum, both the building itself and the art on view.

But sure enough, wouldn't you know it, within hours of returning home to Jerusalem, news broke that terrorists had set off bombs inside a bus in Tel Aviv. So much for the different sense of reality that we felt during our stay there.

Robert Sarner can be reached at rsarner@netvision.net.il.

The crisis facing the Israeli left

The election of Menachem Begin as prime minister in 1977 and the victory of the Likud party marked the most significant change in the structure of Israeli politics since 1948. This was the first defeat for the secular Labor bloc following 50 years in which it dominated Zionist and Israeli institutions, and reflected the response to the earthquake of the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since then, the division between left and right has remained relatively even, with small shifts among swing voters determining the outcome of each election, as well as the direction of Israeli policies.

In the wake of the collapse of the Oslo process and the terrorist war that is being waged by the Palestinians, Israeli politics is going through the most substantial sea change since 1977, and perhaps since 1948. The fortunes of the Labor party and the left have never been lower, and public opinion polls show that Prime Minister Ehud Barak would barely receive 20 percent of the vote if elections were held today.

Despite the promises to be the prime minister of "everyone," Barak has alienated religious Israelis, the Sephardi community, new immigrants and almost every other group. This gap may close to some degree before the Feb. 6 elections, particularly if the Israeli-Arab population decides to support Barak, but the writing is on the wall. In spite of Ariel Sharon's many handicaps and mistakes, including his role in the 1982 Lebanon War, the rejection of Barak's failed policies is far stronger in the minds of Israeli voters.

These developments reflect the disintegration of optimism generated by the 1993 Oslo agreements. Instead of the promised exchange of "land for peace," the territory given to the Palestinians has been used as the foundation for terror.

As a result, many of the strongest supporters of this process, such as Amos Oz (the "spiritual leader" of the Meretz party) and A.B. Yehoshua, have finally recognized that, despite the slogans, Arafat and the Palestinians are not "partners for peace."

Former president Ezer Weizman, who was known for his often outspoken support for the negotiations, endorsed Ariel Sharon for prime minister. Others have reluctantly but realistically acknowledged that the whole peace process was a fraud, and the Palestinian goal of destroying Israel has not changed.

The futures of the politicians who were responsible for Oslo and who sold the process as the basis for ending the Arab-Israeli conflict, including Yosi Beilin and Uri Savir, have become very bleak. While they were running the Foreign Ministry, Peres, Beilin and Savir stopped the information activities that explained the history of the conflict, on the grounds that this was incompatible with peace. This left the field wide open for the extensive Palestinian disinformation and propaganda campaign that has been so damaging in the past three months.

Similarly, journalists and newspapers who shared their ideological blinders have lost credibility. For years, they gave prominent coverage to the proponents and apparent successes of the negotiations, while commenting derogatorily or excluding the critical views and assessments. They blamed the Jewish settlers for impeding peace, and ignored or excused Palestinian hatred and violence.

The left was also responsible for destroying the image of Israel around the world. In the effort to be accepted as part of the "politically correct" in-crowd around the world, Israeli politicians, intellectuals, and journalists blamed their own country and leaders for "placing obstacles in the path of peace." At the same time, they provided excuses for Arafat and the Palestinians, paving the way for foreigners to follow suit.

To survive as a significant political force, the Israeli left will have to reinvent itself. The next generation of Labor's leaders must also work on becoming less arrogant and self-assured, and far more realistic about the dangers facing Israel and the Jewish people.

Iraq 10 years after the end of the Gulf War

Ten years ago this week, a coalition of nations spearheaded by the United States and Britain launched Operation Desert Storm. Its purpose: to eject the Iraqi army from occupied Kuwait.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For me, the war began on Jan. 16, eastern standard time, when CNN's regular 6 p.m. newscast was suddenly pre-empted by a live feed from Baghdad, where it was already 2 a.m. The night sky of the besieged Iraqi capital was streaked with luminous tracer bullets and illuminated by flashes of garish light. In the distance, the crushing thud of bombs could plainly be heard.

Saddam Hussein, the Iraqi strongman, had contemptuously ignored a Jan. 15 United Nations deadline to withdraw from Kuwait, and now Iraq was clearly paying the price.

Operation Desert Storm, designed in part to defang Iraq, was largely successful, though critics still complain that the United States stopped its military offensive far soo soon.

Iraq was evicted from Kuwait. The Iraqi army was soundly battered, albeit not destroyed. Iraq's stockpile of non-conventional weapons of mass destruction – nuclear, biological and chemical – was all but eradicated. In addition, Iraq was subjected to a rigorous regime of UN economic sanctions and weapons inspections.

Not long after the war ended, the United States and Britain imposed "no-fly" zones in northern and southern Iraq to further weaken the country and to protect Kurdish and Shiite Iraqis from the wrath of Iraqi forces. They had risen up against Iraq in the dying days of the war, and Saddam Hussein had brutally struck back.

Nine years on, these air exclusionary zones are still in effect, and sporadic American and British raids against Iraq's air defence system have damaged it quite badly and claimed the lives of some 300 Iraqi soldiers and civilians.

Iraq, a decade after the Gulf War, is but a pale shadow of itself militarily, politically and economically. Much to the relief of its neighbours, Iraq has been radically cut down to size in terms of its power and influence. Its parlous status notwithstanding, Iraq continues to thumb its nose at the world. And Saddam Hussein, the master of deceit who precipitated the 1991 Gulf War, is alive and well, having outlasted two American presidents, George Bush and Bill Clinton.

Iraq has broken out of its regional isolation. Egypt – among other Arab countries – and Turkey have restored diplomatic ties with Iraq. Syria, its ideological arch-enemy, has upgraded relations with Iraq and reopened a cross-border oil pipeline. Saudi Arabia, threatened by Iraq's thrust into Kuwait, has reopened the border with Iraq. Arab airlines have more or less resumed service to Baghdad. Iran's president, Mohammed Khatami, met recently with Izzat Ibrahim, the vice-chairman of Iraq's governing body, the Revolutionary Command Council. Given the war Iran fought with Iraq from 1980 to 1988, this was quite a development.

And in another sign of its rehabilitation in the eyes of Muslim opinion, Iraq was invited to the recent Arab summit in Cairo, convened to condemn Israel for its handling of the current Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

In a transparent bid to curry favour with the Palestinians since the outbreak of the new intifadah, Iraq has played its Palestinian card to the hilt, becoming the darling of Palestinians throughout the territories.

Iraq called for a jihad against Israel, not once but twice. Iraq massed troops close to the frontier with Jordan, then pulled them back. It dispatched supplies to the autonomous Palestinian areas. It is sending $10,000 to families of Palestinians – so-called martyrs – killed by the Israelis for resisting the occupation.

It will be recalled that the Palestinian question also proved useful to Iraq during the political crisis preceding the Gulf War. In an attempt to deflect the opprobrium of having invaded a fellow Arab country, Iraq harped on the Arab-Israeli dispute, offering to vacate Kuwait in exchange for a full Israeli withdrawal from the disputed territories. This cynical ploy was applauded in radical Arab circles, but was regarded as a non-starter by moderate Arab regimes.

Since the Gulf War, Iraq has worked tirelessly to loosen the sanctions that have devastated its once prosperous economy. On this score, the UN's policy is clear. It will not lift sanctions unless it can certify that Iraq is completely free of all prohibited weapons of mass destruction.

The UN established a special commission, UNSCOM, to ferret out and destroy such weapons. The Iraqi government made a show of co-operating with the disarmament inspectors. In reality, however, Iraq repeatedly tried to sabotage its mandate.

Scott Ritter, UNSCOM's former chief inspector, writes in Endgame (Simon & Schuster) that Iraq deliberately concealed a panoply of weapons – notably long-range ballistic missiles, missile launchers and chemical and biological agents – from the inspectors after its defeat in the Gulf War. Nor did Iraq own up to its nuclear weapons program (which Israel set back by years with its June 1981 bombing of Iraq's reactor near Baghdad).

Despite Iraq's prevarications, UNSCOM disposed of much of Iraq's prohibited weaponry. But according to Ritter, an American, the true extent of its armoury may never be known since its concealment efforts have been rather sophisticated.

After a series of increasingly bitter disputes which brought the region to the brink of war, Iraq expelled the arms inspectors in December 1998 once and for all.

This brazen act of defiance prompted Clinton to launch a five-day blitz in mid-December during which U.S. and British aircraft bombarded strategic Iraqi targets. It was basically an exercise in futility. Satellite photographs subsequently revealed that Iraq had rebuilt bombed military and industrial sites.

West Bank Palestinians rally on behalf of Saddam Hussein.

Two years ago, in an effort to appease Iraq, the UN disbanded UNSCOM, which had been headed by Rolf Ekeus (a Swede) and Richard Butler (an Australian). It was replaced by the less intrusive United Nations Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission, directed by Swedish national Hans Blix.

True to form, Iraq rejected the commission, declaring that no new arms inspectors would be permitted into Iraq unless a date for the end of sanctions was announced.

Russia, China and France basically support Iraq's demand. But at the insistence of the United States, the UN Security Council has refrained from lifting the sanctions, and so they remain in place.

The incoming American secretary of state, Colin Powell, who takes office on Jan. 20, has promised to "re-energize" sanctions against Iraq. Powell has a personal stake in the issue. During the Gulf War, he was chair of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff. Indeed, he preferred sanctions over war.

In actual fact, the Security Council has gradually loosened the sanctions in reaction to Iraq's disastrous humanitarian problems, which range from widespread malnutrition to rampant disease.

To help alleviate the situation, the UN enacted an oil-for-food program in 1996 subject to renewal every six months. The last extension was approved on Dec. 11. Under the provisions of the plan, Iraq is permitted to keep 75 percent of its oil revenues so as to buy food and medicine for its impoverished population.

The rest of its oil profits are channelled into a fund to compensate the victims of Iraq's aggression. One of the recipients is Israel, hit by a barrage of Iraqi Scud missiles during the 1991 war.

Thanks to the oil-for-food program, Iraq currently exports upwards of three million barrels of oil per day, less than only Saudi Arabia, and earns more from such sales than it did before the imposition of the embargo. One can safely assume that Saddam Hussein is using a good proportion of this windfall – $37 billion and counting – to rebuild his army and arsenal of non-conventional weapons.

As Andrew and Patrick Cockburn write in Out of the Ashes: The Resurrection of Saddam Hussein (HarperCollins), he has learned to appreciate their value. Chemical weapons not only turned the tide for Iraq in its long war with Iran, but broke the back of the Kurdish revolt.

Ten years after the Gulf War, Iraq is a somewhat cowed and crippled nation, but Saddam Hussein is very much in charge.

It would be foolhardy to discount Iraq as a factor in Middle Eastern politics, now or in the future.

Kinship is fundamental

Fate and Destiny: From the Holocaust to the State of Israel*, by Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, Ktav, 1999, $19.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

No man was better known or had greater influence on centrist Orthodox Judaism in America than Rabbi J. B. Soloveitchik. He was the personification of the broadminded Lithuanian talmudic scholar whose knowledge includes all aspects of Judaic and secular learning. Rabbi Soloveitchik studied physics, mathematics and philosophy at the University of Berlin in the 1920s, where he earned his PhD in philosophy.

In his classic essay The Lonely Man of Faith, (first published as long ago as 1926), he confessed, "The role of the man of faith... oscillates between ecstasy in God's companionship and despair when he feels abandoned by God... I am lonely because at times I feel rejected and thrust away by everybody, not excluding my most intimate friends."

Fundamental to his thinking was need for kinship with all Jews, regardless of their degree of religious observance. He opposed the polarization of religious and secular Jewry because it imperilled the unity of the people.

Faced with the atrocities of Nazism he asked, "Can one forget even during a moment of profound faith the magnitude of the evil that reigns in the world? Is there anywhere a sound bridge which can take us back and forth from the secular man-dominated, day-to-day reality to the inner sanctum of religion?"

Fate and Destiny was originally delivered as an address (undoubtedly, in shorter form) in 1956. It is now published for the first time in English. It deals with such matters as the problem of evil, the relationship between the Diaspora and the State of Israel, the essential difference between fate and destiny, and the meaning of the two covenants that were established between God and the children of Israel, the first in the Exodus from Egypt and the other at Mount Sinai.

Many of the ideas in this slender volume are still alive, stimulating and original. Others, however, are dated – interesting only in the author's reaction to problems of 45 years ago.

The "Rav's" response to evil is controversial. He writes, "afflictions come to elevate a person, to purify and sanctify his spirit, to cleanse and purge it of the dross of superficiality and vulgarity, to refine his soul and to broaden his horizons. In a word, the function of suffering is to mend that which is flawed in an individual's personality. The Halachah teaches us that the sufferer commits a grave sin if he allows his troubles to go to waste and remain without meaning or purpose."

As an example, Job was punished by God for his egotism and lack of concern for the larger community. Divine wrath abated only when Job became less selfish and was able for the first time to pray for his friends.

Deeply concerned for the future of the State of Israel, then only seven years old, Rabbi Soloveitchik wrote in anger that, "We Orthodox Jews suffer from a unique illness which is not to be found among non-religious Jews (with a few exceptions); we are all misers! In comparison with other American Jews, we do not excel in the attribute of chesed. We are content to give a few pennies, and in return for our paltry contribution we demand a hefty this-worldly reward and a place at the head of the line."

Readers interested in studying the life and ideas of the "Rav" in greater depth and detail may turn to the recent two-volume work by Aaron Rakeffet–Rothkoff, The Rav – The World of Joseph B. Soloveitchik, (Ktav, 1999).

Snow and blood: the flow of prejudice

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Last winter, as I drove past a right-wing Orthodox elementary school, three snowballs were deliberately aimed and came hurtling at my windshield. Startled, I swerved briefly and narrowly avoided an accident. I stopped the vehicle and got out, looking for some answers.

When I questioned the snowball throwers if they were aware of the consequences of what they had done, they smiled sheepishly and did not try to defend themselves. But neither did they apologize. They stared at me and noticed that I wore a knitted kippah and that I was clean-shaven. I asked them if they were familiar with the passages in the Gemarah regarding chillul HaShem, the defamation of God's name. They were silent.

Impulsively, fuelled by a mix of irritation and curiosity, I asked one who was staring at me, "Why do you learn Torah?" He was silent. "What is the point?" I insisted.

But the interview had come to a close.

"Don't do it again," I admonished, gloomily confident in the knowledge that as my car rolled out of sight, the snow would again be flying in all directions.

Okay, young kids blowing off steam, no big deal. And I had clearly lost my cool and interrogated them in a patently futile manner. But it wasn't so much the snowballs as the sense of my oddity to them that disturbed me. I was a Jew, but I was not them. I was a foreigner.

Last year at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), a bastion of pluralistic pride, I was yet again listening to some of my students mock what they saw as the insularity of the haredi world — their lack of worldliness, their lack of culture, their "oppressed" women, their "slavish" adherence to the mitzvot, their sameness (black hats), yada, yada, yada.

I asked my students, if I were to describe another ethnic group – say African-Americans – in the patronizing and dismissive way that they heap abuse on haredi Jews, wouldn't the school soon be flooded by calls excoriating that bigoted teacher of theirs?

In his Shmoneh Parakim, the Rambam forewarns that he will omit his sources for fear that a perfectly good idea will be rejected by readers if they disapprove of the source. Is the "other" so despicable that all who do not look or sound like oneself must be the enemy?

The right-wing world has a commodity that is often lacking elsewhere: passion. And passion is a wonderful but incendiary thing. Like fire, it can leave the negligent user singed and the environs burned.

And what of the self-congratulatory worldliness of my non-Orthodox students? Allan Bloom argues that contemporary kids have internalized openness as the only virtue, and he notes the irony of their intolerance of those with an actual conviction about truth: "The true believer is the real danger… The point is not to correct the mistakes and really be right; rather it is not to think you are right at all."

This, too, is what liberalism has wrought.

Shylock's bewilderment – "If you prick us do we not bleed?" – should be the voice of our conscience. We all need to realize that the Jews we exclude bleed red as we do, even when snow or prejudice blinds us to their wounds.

Campaign sites for PM

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

There is never a shortage of news about Israel, especially as Israelis prepare to vote for a prime minister. But thanks to the Internet, you can read – and listen to – the same news Israelis do as they prepare to choose a leader. Today, a survey of some of the best Israeli sites for following the campaign for prime minister.

First, just why are Israelis voting for a prime minister and not for the Knesset? The Israeli daily Ha'aretz presents a guide for the perplexed as part of its special online Election 2001 coverage in English [http://www2.haaretz.co.il/special/elections2001-e/]. The paper also explains the 1992 reforms, which gave Israelis the right to vote twice – once for a political party and then directly for the prime minister. The paper has the latest news and analysis, and there are also links to the some of the larger political parties and a primer for the election.

(For even more about the Israeli electoral system, the Knesset Web site provides plenty of background [http://www.knesset.gov.il/knesset/knes/eng_mimshal_beh.htm]. And the Ministry of Foreign Affairs goes into detail about the mechanics of voting directly for the prime minister [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00hl0].)

If you are looking for more news, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency provides wire stories for Jewish papers around the world but you can have access to their coverage directly from their Web site [http://www.jta.org]. And don't miss the Jerusalem Post [http://www.jpost.com], the Jerusalem Report bi-weekly [http:// www.jrep.com/] and Globes, which looks at Israeli news from a business perspective [http://www. globes.co.il/].

One of my favourite sites is the Green Screen News Library for Middle East and Israel [http://www.gsnonweb.com/]. This amazing site carries the latest stories from Reuters, Associated Press, the Jerusalem Post and Ha'aretz. But what it makes it truly valuable is that has a fully searchable archives of 85,000 articles dating back to January 1998.

If you would rather listen to the news from Israel, the Voice of Israel provides two English language bulletins daily [http://www.israelradio.org/english.html]. If you don't have it already, you'll need to download and install the free Real audio software program to hear the news [http://www.real.com/player/].

There are hundreds of general newspapers and broadcasters online. For an excellent list of media available plus a tutorial of how to search for news, I recommend visiting Journalism.net [http://journalism net.com/papers/].

As we approach the election date, the campaigning is sure to get pretty rough. If you need a break, you can go to the Dry Bones Web site [http://info.jpost.com/2000/Supplements/DryBones/GALLERY.HTML]. For over 20 years, Yaakov Kirschen has been able to find a silver lining in the darkest of clouds. Now you can get lost in Kirschen's archive with hundreds of his cartoons.

Just because you may not have a vote in the election for prime minister doesn't mean you can't make your voice heard. There are plenty of discussion areas at the Usenet [news:soc.culture.israel] and at About.com [http://forums.about.com/ab-israelicultr/] where you can debate in whose hands the country's future should rest. But watch it – the talk can get extremely overheated.

However, if you have something more personal to say to Messrs. Ehud Barak and Ariel Sharon, why not e-mail them? Ariel Sharon [asharon@knesset.gov.il] and Ehud Barak [barak@pmo.gov.il] probably aren't spending that much time surfing on their computers at the moment. But you never know.

Next week, the candidates and their official Web sites.

Moses: predestined or self-made leader?

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

In the middle 1800s, a controversy erupted over a legend about Moses. This legend, mentioned in Tiferet Yisrael (Kiddushin 4:14; a translation and discussion of this section of the Tiferet Yisrael appears in S. Leiman, R. Israel Lipshutz: The Portrait of Moses, Tradition, summer 1989), portrays Moses as a person who had negative character traits that he worked to overcome.

The legend tells the story of an Arabian king who had heard of Moses' fame and commissioned his portrait, which he gave to his advisors, who could tell the character traits of a person by looking at his face. They told the king that Moses' face betrayed the character traits of a wicked, arrogant person drawn to many forms of vice.

Unable to believe this assessment, the king assumed that either the artist or his advisors were mistaken, and he went to visit Moses. He saw that Moses' face was exactly as the artist had drawn it, and told Moses that he realized that his advisors had made an enormous mistake. Moses told the king that his advisors were not mistaken. By nature, he had many negative character traits; however, with great effort and determination, he overcame his natural inclinations.

This legend about Moses incited impassioned opposition from many rabbis, who considered the Tiferet Yisrael's legend to be insulting. They cited talmudic proofs that Moses was destined to be a great man from birth (Sotah 12b).

The subtext of this controversy is about the relative merits of the tzaddik gamur, (one who is naturally pious), and a baal tshuvah (a self-made pious person who overcomes his negative nature). To the Tiferet Yisrael, a weak man who improves himself and overcomes his nature is extremely impressive. To his critics, however, Moses is far more impressive if he was always destined for greatness, a prodigy born with few, if any, human weaknesses.

I would like to stake out a third position. It is possible to argue that Moses was destined for greatness, yet at the same time vulnerable to manifold weaknesses. One example of this is Moses' leadership abilities. The Torah (3:11-18) goes out of its way to tell us of Moses' courageous actions as a youth. In three instances, he stands up for the underdog against a powerful aggressor. He saves a Jewish slave from a bloodthirsty taskmaster, he breaks up a fight between two Jewish slaves, and he saves the daughters of Jethro from the harassment of the shepherds. He seems to be destined for leadership, to be the one who is going to free the Jews from the hand of Pharaoh the oppressor.

At the same time, he seems to be ill prepared to lead the Jews out of Egypt. He proclaims that he has difficulty speaking (4:10), and begs God to send someone else to redeem the Jews (4:14). These certainly are not the attributes of a natural leader!

Moses has many character traits, some that make him a great leader and others that make him a poor one. He can choose to maximize his positive traits, or he can be held down by his negative ones. As he develops, Moses overcomes his weaknesses, becoming an exceptional orator who is unafraid to lead and take decisive action. In doing this, Moses ends up being both a natural leader and a self-made leader.

Self-made greatness and natural greatness are not necessarily contradictory. What Moses teaches us is that the difference between greatness and failure is which character traits are emphasized and developed, and which are not.

Shabbat Shalom.

Airline guide lists Jerusalem as a country

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto travel executive is fuming over an international airline guide that lists Jerusalem as a country apart from Israel.

A few weeks ago, David Freudmann, vice-president of sales at UniWorld Travel and Tourism Inc., noticed that the Official Airline Guide (OAG), a telephone-book sized directory of flights to and from all countries, lists Israel under "I" but also Jerusalem under "J."

"It's the only city to be listed in there," Freudmann said. "This is clearly a political statement. They have isolated Jerusalem, set it apart. That really irks me."

Freudmann, a board member at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, fired off a letter to the OAG's Illinois office and publisher in London.

The OAG, which is updated monthly but has listed Jerusalem as a separate "country" for years, replied that it follows geographical guidelines set out by the International Air Transport Association (IATA).

When IATA changes its policy on Jerusalem, "we will follow suit immediately," the guide's publishers wrote Freudmann. "Until then we will continue to follow the international standard."

Bridget Glavaz, a spokesperson for the OAG, said the guide is looking into the matter. "We have taken it up with our U.K. office," she told The CJN.

Freudmann took the matter up with the IATA office in Montreal. An IATA spokesperson left a message on his answering machine saying that because Jerusalem "is disputed territory," it cannot be "associated" with Israel.

The spokesperson added that IATA's position is "neutral" and "non-political."

Freudmann scoffs at that explanation.

"Of course it's political. When I asked her what the capital of Israel is, she said Tel Aviv. And Jerusalem is not a country."

He then spoke to Israel's tourism minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, during his recent visit to Toronto. In a letter to Freudmann, Lipkin-Shahak said he has ordered his ministry to look into the matter.

"This is a highly emotional issue for me," said Freudmann, who organized the community's recent solidarity mission to Israel.

He notes an irony of the situation: Since the recent violence began in Israel, Jerusalem's Atarot Airport has been closed.

Monique Bertrand, a spokesperson for IATA, told The CJN that the OAG could change its listing if it wants to. She said the guide is published independently of IATA.

However, she said Jerusalem is the only city in IATA's code assignments not to be associated with any country.

For example, Toronto's IATA code is YTO, listed in the airline guide under the heading "ON Canada." Jerusalem's code is JRS, but it is not accompanied by a country.

Bertrand also referred to Jerusalem as "disputed territory." She said IATA does not treat Jerusalem as a country, but she also said that as far she knows, it is the only city among roughly 10,000 IATA code listings not to be associated with a country.

She said IATA has no control over how country and city codes are assigned. She said it's done by the International Standards Organization.

In the meantime, Freudmann vows to keep up his flight to delist Jerusalem from the flight guide. "I won't rest until this is over," he says.

Preliminary hearing set for Daniel Weiz

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A preliminary inquiry into the case of three young men accused of beating Dimitri (Matti) Baranovski to death will begin on July 9 at Old City Hall.

Altogether, 45 days of court time spread over three months have been set aside for the preliminary hearing, which will determine whether there is sufficient evidence to proceed to trial.

Israeli Daniel Weiz, 20, and two teenagers, who cannot be identified, were led into a North York courtroom in handcuffs last week for a brief appearance while lawyers discussed the court dates and other preliminary matters.

The court will also convene for 13 days in March and April to hear preliminary motions in the case. The contents of the motions are subject to a publication ban.

Baranovski was beaten to death in a North York park in November 1999 by a gang of masked youths demanding cigarettes and money.

Weiz was living with his father at the time while on leave from the Israeli army. He returned to Israel a week after Baranovski's death. Weiz fought Canada's extradition request, taking his case to the Israeli Supreme Court. His appeals were turned down and he was brought to Toronto in October 2000. Weiz has maintained he is innocent of the murder charges connected to Baranovski's death.

In other developments, lawyers Owen Wigderson and Andras Schreck, representing one of the young offenders, acknowledged they are appealing a ruling that bumped the young offenders into adult court. Schreck said the Ontario Court of Appeal has yet to announce a date for the appeal, but the preliminary inquiry will proceed regardless of the appeal court's ruling.

A message to our community,

I would like to take this opportunity to thank our community in a formal and public way. Baycrest is among the privileged in that it has a large, loyal and supportive community. Without this support we could not have become a centre of excellence in aging... a leader in care, research, education and community programs.

I am sure that most of you will have heard about the current challenges we face at Baycrest – challenges that relate to closing the gap between what we spend and what we receive. Baycrest has always provided care far beyond what the government funds in our Jewish Home for the Aged. We are proud to have been able to maintain this standard with the generous support of the community. The reality is, however, that now the gap is too large and has created a serious financial situation that we must address in a responsible manner. That is why we have designed a plan that reduces some of our costs in the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged. Even with the reductions, our costs will remain significantly above what the government funds because we are committed to maintaining the quality of care for which we have become known.

We know that the impending changes will be difficult for everyone – residents, families and staff. I want to emphasize that you have my commitment, and the Board of Directors', that we will make every effort to minimize the stress, keep the lines of communication open, and ensure that we thoroughly evaluate every step we take.

I am sure we will be able to address all of our challenges in a balanced way, and the key to our success will be the fact we have a loyal and supportive community. That is what has made Baycrest great, and that is what will keep us strong.

Again, I thank you for all that you do to support Baycrest.

Sincerely,

Stephen W. Herbert

Conference explores challenges facing large congregations

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Financial matters – setting and collecting dues, and determining financial assistance – were the major topics at a recent synagogue conference session identifying problems and challenges facing large congregations.

A number of issues surfaced at other sessions, but economic issues are "always big topics on our agenda," said conference chair Scott Kaplan of Atlanta. "If there are no funds, there can be no study of Torah."

The two-day Conference for Leadership of Large Congregations, held under the auspices of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ), was a forum for lay leaders and staff (not clergy) of congregations with at least 750 family units.

The second of its kind, it followed an initial conference two years ago, and meetings at USCJ's international biennal convention last year.

Sixty-two participants represented 10 American and seven Canadian congregations, as well as USCJ's main New York office and its Toronto-based Canadian regional office that serves Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. The event was held Jan. 7 and 8 at the Regal Constellation Hotel.

Scott Kaplan, conference chair, said he wasn't disappointed in the turnout representing a third of eligible congregations, given Toronto's weather this winter and the timing of the meeting immediately following winter holidays.

Over half the participants were from Toronto (congregations Adath Israel, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda, Beth Tikvah and Beth Tzedec). Montreal and Ottawa were also represented.

Fred Pellatt, new president of Montreal's Shaare Zion Congregation, which has 800 families "and growing," said he attended the conference to find out the views and news from other congregations.

Howard Zweig, president of the 1,150-member Beth David, found the informal discussions more valuable than the formal ones covering topics such as synagogue schools, budgeting, and recruitment of clergy, including discussion of a new rabbinic contract in the works as a joint effort of USCJ and the Rabbinical Assembly (the umbrella organization for Conservative rabbis).

"We all have the same problems," said Zweig.

The purpose of the conference, according to Kaplan, was to assist the congregations "to better maintain what we like to call synagogues of excellence that reach out and touch every member, to create better relationships between lay and professional staff, to plan and implement programs that fulfil the needs of all members."

Personalizing the synagogue experience was a recurring theme. In the initial session, during which a representative of each synagogue shared a successful programming idea, a number of participants addressed that issue.

Howard Goldstein, president of the 1,500-family Adath Israel, spoke about the congregation's chesed committee, reinstituted about 2½ years ago.

"It really has brought together our congregation," he said, "especially those in need, with our lay people who are able to help them, and has softened the hard exterior that a large congregation sometimes portrays."

Bob Cohen, president of Toronto's Beth Tzedec, the largest North American Conservative congregation with 2,950 families, said his synagogue's chesed committee has "made us into a more mentschlich place to be."

He also spoke of the congregation's fledgling Jewish personal family trainer program, an initiative of Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum, which matches congregants with mentors for anything from learning to put on tfillin or lead a service to reading Hebrew or making challah.

The program, which recently received a STAR (Synagogue Transformation and Renewal) grant, is an efficient use of human resources, said Leon Wagschal of Beth Tzedec.

Brian Pearl, president of Ottawa's Agudath Israel Congregation, noted in its most recent bulletin that the 800-family synagogue's mission statement says Agudath Israel is "a welcoming Conservative congregation."

Its social action programs, such as visiting seniors and participating in Ottawa's kosher food bank, have been "growing by leaps and bounds," he said at the conference.

Other issues that arose included fund-raising and getting people into the synagogue – Robert Komorn of Beth Yeshurun, a 2,229-family congregation in Houston, Tex. spoke of a monthly Friday night service modelled on New York's B'nai Jeshurun that attracts 800; and Beth David's Zweig discussed a Friday morning mother-and-baby program that also addresses issues facing aging congregations.

Issues of women's ritual participation arose in informal conversations and peripherally in some sessions, although it was not on the agenda per se. Some congregations, it was noted, have more than one service, to accommodate egalitarian-minded and non-egalitarian-minded congregants.

> Social programs growing by 'leaps and bounds'

Women constituted about one quarter of the participants. Sarah Small of Kansas City, Mo., noted that she was the second woman president of her 1,100-family, 123-year-old congregation, Beth Shalom. The first took the position 10 years ago.

The viability of sisterhood organizations arose at at least one lunch table, when one president noted a lack of interest and another mentioned the "mainstreaming" phenomenon, where women have become involved in the governance of the synagogue itself, not just the sisterhood.

In a session on Synagogue Transformation Through Mentoring, Rabbi Jerome Epstein, USCJ's New York-based executive vice-president, spoke about fostering spiritual growth.

A lot of congregations have been rethinking the role of their clergy, figuring that a number of hours per week working with a small group of individuals may have more impact than spending the same time polishing a sermon, he said.

During USCJ president Stephen Wolnek's session on the umbrella organization as a support for "brand identification" of Conservative Judaism, he described the New York-based umbrella's many services, including assistance in leadership development and congregational programming, and said changes would be forthcoming to improve user-friendliness for the congregations.

In response to questions about the relationship between United Synagogue and the Rabbinical Assembly (umbrella for Conservative rabbis), Wolnek clarified that USCJ represents the congregations as an advocate.

Two issues affecting Canada, he noted, are the lack of a relationship of USCJ with the Canadian government and the fact that the lower Canadian dollar makes this country less attractive than the United States to synagogue professionals.

Congregations in Saskatoon, Edmonton and Vancouver are currently without rabbis, noted Rabbi Moshe Edelman, USCJ's director, leadership development, and the conference organizer.

Wolnek stressed that despite a "divergence" between the right and left wings of the Conservative movement, the movement, across the board, stands for Shabbat, kashrut and a meaningful relationship with God.

Holocaust memorial erected in Iasi, Romania

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — On a chilly winter afternoon in December, some 50 people gathered in a courtyard outside a former police station in Iasi, Romania, to commemorate the more than 13,000 local Holocaust victims who died nearly 60 years earlier.

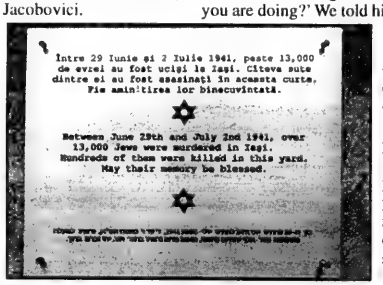
In the summer of 1941, the Jews of Iasi and the surrounding towns and villages were rounded up and brought to the police courtyard. Hundreds were shot immediately, but most were loaded into cattle cars that were nailed shut.

Crammed with human cargo, the trains travelled up and down Romania. Within days, 90 percent of the occupants died of asphyxiation or dehydration.

Last month's commemorative ceremony in Iasi centred around the installation of a memorial plaque for the victims. The event, which garnered headlines around the world, was orchestrated by Toronto documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici.

Jacobovici says the installation of the plaque was an unprecedented event in Romania: it was the first public memorial to the Holocaust in the entire country.

Jacobovici never had official permission to put up the plaque he brought to Romania from Toronto, he says.



Intre 29 Iunie si 2 Iulie 1941, peste 13,000
de evrei au fost uciși in Iași. Cîteva sute
dintre ei au fost asasinați in aceasta curte.
Fie amintirea lor binecuvintată.
Between June 29th and July 2nd 1941, over
13,000 Jews were murdered in Iași.
Hundreds of them were killed in this yard.
May their memory be blessed.

The plaque that was installed on the former police station.

When he and his sister Sara visited Iasi, their father's hometown, and discovered there was no public memorial to the Holocaust in Romania, "We pledged that we would come back one day and put up a plaque."

The time was opportune when he returned to Romania last month for a film shoot, he says.

Few people knew about the plight of the Iasi Jews and the "infamous death trains," Jacobovici says.

"Hundreds were shot in the courtyard. Among them was my dad, who was left for dead. He survived, but he lost his whole family. He was able to cross the front lines to the Soviet Union where he served in the Red Army."

When organizing the plaque ceremony, Jacobovici says he notified the international press corps which, by coincidence, happened to be in Bucharest in full force to cover the federal elections.

"The extreme right-wing party got 30 percent of the vote. This was a shock for international community. These guys are a fascist party.

"I was there between the election and the run-off vote... The plaque ceremony became an international story because of the election.

"The contrast between the right coming to power, and me putting up the plaque without permission captured people's imagination."

The fact that the Romanian media covered the story was very significant, Jacobovici says. "Romania was like Italy, an ally of Nazi Germany. It was not occupied."

Romanians, however, are reluctant to admit their part in committing atrocities against the Jews during the war.

Half of the 800,000 Jews living in prewar Romania were murdered, Jacobovici says, and there are only 15,000 Jews left in Romania and about 500 mostly elderly Jews in Iasi. "They were nervous about putting up the public plaque."

When the community had asked for permission to put up a public plaque in the past, they did not get a yes or a no, Jacobovici says.

"We didn't ask anybody's permission. Felix Golubov, the associate producer and I drilled holes into the building at 11 p.m. the night before to get ready for the ceremony.

"There was a guard and he said, 'What you are doing?' We told him exactly what we were doing. We looked so sure of ourselves. People don't do that sort of thing there unless they have permission.

"We said, 'Do you want to see the permit?' We reached down into our pockets. He said it was OK."

"So we proceeded to drill and put plugs in the hole with two guards looking on."

During the ceremony, they screwed the plaque into the wall, damaging the screws so the plaque could not be easily removed, Jacobovici says.

One of the most moving moments of the commemoration, which included the reciting of Kaddish and El Mare Rachamim, was the testimony of an elderly man, an Iasi resident, who had survived the "infamous death trains," Jacobovici says.

"He said the living had to pile up the dead bodies so they could breathe. They lay naked – it was so hot inside those cars – with their faces pressed against cracks on the floor to get air. and they drank urine for hydration. He said no one should ever know such a thing."

Jacobovici says he told the Romanian media that he didn't need permission to put up the plaque.

"I said the Jewish people purchased that courtyard with their blood. The people who use that office building should seek permission from the Jewish community to use that courtyard as a parking lot."

Jacobovici says he was tense during the installation ceremony.

"I felt the weight of what had happened there. I felt that I was doing it for my aunt, my father's sister, her husband and her child. I felt I was the living emissary of the ones who weren't there."

Israelis and Palestinians: Peace or animosity?

By MEIR ROMEM

Until recently, whenever Israeli leaders met with foreign dignitaries, they would speak more of the needs of the Palestinian people than of their own people.

Israeli officials understood that in order to achieve peace with the Palestinians, there was a need for a win-win situation and not a zero-sum game. We believed that the more we invested in the development of the economy and in the well-being of the Palestinians, the greater the prospects for peace.

Throughout the years of the Oslo process Israeli leadership never abandoned the dream of a flourishing Middle East where all the nations in the region would benefit. When Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres shook hands with Arafat on the White House lawn on September 13, 1993, they saw the gesture as the first step towards peace between Israel and the Palestinians, to be followed by a comprehensive peace between Israel and all its neighbours.

Last July, at the Camp David Summit, Prime Minister Ehud Barak made a very generous offer to Arafat, which was rejected. Arafat then opted for violence, thereby destroying the varying degrees of confidence between the peoples that had been built so carefully.

The Palestinian leadership has used lies and deception to justify the violence they initiated in order to portray Israel as the aggressor. The world has watched but has refused to acknowledge who has been the aggressor and who has been the victim.

Arafat has repeatedly misrepresented himself as a native of Jerusalem, while in fact he was born in Cairo. In fact, he was reported to have applied for immigration to Canada in the '50s, according to Abu Rish, author of a biography on the PA leader.

Palestinian children are taught to hate Israel. In recent months, children have been collected from school, bused to training camps where they are trained in fighting, and then sent to the line of fire between Arafat's Tanzim forces who constantly shoot at Israeli soldiers and civilians.

Even vehicles clearly marked as ambulances, the universally accepted instrument of humanitarianism, have been used by the Palestinians to transport weapons and to shield snipers, as they have attacked 49 Israeli ambulances carrying the sick and wounded.

In the midst of such current events, it is important to remember the history of the conflict.

On Nov. 29, 1947, the General Assembly of the United Nations voted to partition Britain's Mandatory trust in Palestine and to establish two states, an Arab state and a Jewish state. The Jews accepted the decision with joy. The Arabs rejected it; they objected to the very idea and existence of a Jewish state. The following day, Nov. 30, they went to war against the Jews.

In May 1948, when the British evacuated Palestine and the State of Israel was born, the armies of seven Arab states – Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and Yemen – invaded the territory of the newly-born state in order to destroy it. After a long war, an armistice was achieved in 1949.

Between 1948 and 1967, the West Bank and Gaza were occupied by Jordan and Egypt respectively. During those 19 years, no mention was made in the international arena of a Palestinian state. The Palestinians and the Arab states spoke only about the destruction of Israel. They continued to wage a war of terror, and in May 1967, Syria and Egypt concentrated major forces against their declared enemy. Abdul Nasser, the president of Egypt, declared that this was the time to destroy Israel. He said, "The very existence of Israel is an aggression."

At the end of the Six Day War, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 242, which spoke about the withdrawal of Israel from territories, although not all territories, captured in the war. The omission of the word "all" was deliberate. The resolution also did not use the word "Palestinians," but referred to Israel, Jordan, Egypt and Syria only.

In Oct. 1973, Israel was attacked by Syria and Egypt. At the end of the war, the UN Security Council passed Resolution 338. Even this resolution did not mention the word "Palestinians."

In 1993, Israel and the Palestinians signed the Oslo Agreement, which was intended to lead to peace in stages. The agreement established mutual recognition and a common path between Israelis and Palestinians.

Unfortunately, Arafat has decided to deviate from this path and opt for violence. Now we question whether he really desires peace with Israel, or ever truly did. We ask ourselves: Have we made a mistake? Has Arafat deceived us all these years? Is his aim still to destroy Israel?

Despite the events of the past 16 weeks, despite the violence and despite the disappointment, the people of Israel are ready to work hard for peace. It is now up to Arafat to prove his worthiness as a partner. He should immediately call a halt to the violence. He has to choose between a future based on peace, understanding and co-operation or a past based on animosity, conflict and wars.

We hope that he will make the right choice.

Greater Toronto Area

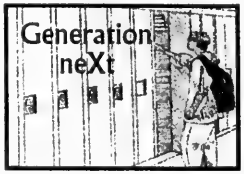
21st century vision

By GILA ASHTOR

We are small but we are many
We are young but we unite,
To the candle of continuity
You are the flame, and we're the light.

Chet Raymo, a renowned scientist and writer, once wrote that the human struggle for perfection is enough to occupy people for a lifetime.

Though no one is perfect, and no one ever will be, every January, people around the world resolve to change things in their lives. From determining to get furniture to beginning an exercise program, we try our best to enrich the very qualities that make our personal lives worth living.



As the next generation of Toronto's Jewish community, it is time us, as Jewish youth members, to make our own additions to this year's list of goals and things-to-do. It is time for us to collectively devise our own New Year's resolutions, not only as teenagers and students, but as members of a larger Jewish community.

From public high schools to Jewish day schools, many students are adamant about the prospects of inventing a set of New Year's resolutions that can apply to everyone. Jordan Shifman, a senior student at York Mills Collegiate Institute, a public school in Toronto, is always interested in discussing the crisis in Israel.

"As teenagers, it should be a resolution for all of us to start telling people what's really happening in Israel," Shifman says. "Not everyone knows that the media can be [biased], and not everyone can distinguish between what is real and what is propaganda... [We need to] either write in to newspapers that misrepresent Israel or talk to our friends about it... we're old enough to start helping Israel in our own way."

While the distance between North American youth and teenagers in Israel makes direct contact difficult, many students agree that kilometres are inconsequential compared to the significance of the bond. Though it is difficult to dictate a resolution plan everyone can relate to, this is the moment to make a difference.

Whether concern for the future is our motivation or we are all simply immersed in the spirit of the new millennium, we all agree that unity is an essential prerequisite to active community service.

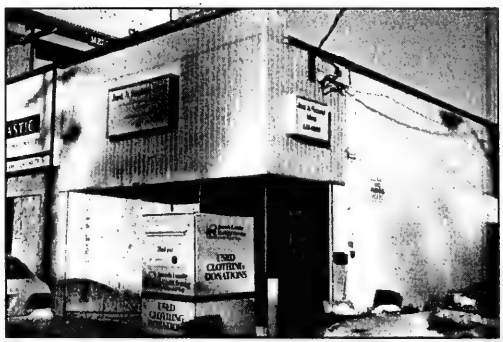
A senior student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Michal Gordon is quick to say that "School can be really time-consuming, especially if you're thinking about university and your future... but I think this year should be a little different... visiting the elderly, the sick and those who need our help is just as important as calculus and chemistry... we all have to try and resolve to remember that."

So, friends, peers and fellow community members, welcome to 2001. This year can be a very special year, for everybody and anybody involved. Not only have we survived the anxious transition into the 21st century, but our common enthusiasm and eagerness to generate unity suggests this new year will be exciting, promising, and entirely unpredictable. After all, if we cannot manage to lose the weight we want, or make a significant difference in our community, we can rest assured that Raymo was right: the very attempt to create serious resolutions will keep us occupied for a lifetime, or at least, until the next January comes.

Thanks to all contributing contacts! Anyone who wishes to add opinions, insights, and ideas is encouraged to email me at isgila@home.com.

Fire guts Just A Second Shop

TORONTO – An early morning fire on Jan. 6 has gutted the Just A Second Shop, the Bathurst Street shop selling used clothing and household items. Nobody was in the building at the time, but all the contents were destroyed.



[Frances Kraft photo]

Jewish Family and Child Service, which operates the shop, is appealing to the community to donate items at its four yellow donation boxes (located at Bialik Hebrew Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools' Thornhill branch, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and at 4117 Bathurst just south of York Downs Drive), or at the store's temporary location, being set up this week at 3544 Bathurst just south of Baycrest Avenue. The cause may have been an electrical problem, according to a JF&CS spokesperson.

JERUSALEM

We the undersigned, devoted to peace and with full respect to other faiths, deem it vital at this particular time to reaffirm our attachment to Jerusalem, the heart and soul of the Jewish people.

We assert the enduring and timeless link between Jerusalem and the Jewish people both historically as Israel's national capital and spiritually as the cornerstone of Judaism.

We revere Jerusalem as the place holiest to our faith, with the Har-Ha-Bayit, the home of our Ancient Temple, as our most sacred site.

We embrace Jerusalem which, for 3,000 years, has served as the celestial and terrestrial capital of none other than the Jewish people.

Contemporary history has clearly demonstrated that only a united Jerusalem under Israeli sovereignty has guaranteed freedom of worship and access to the respective holy sites of all faiths.

The bond between the Jewish people and united Jerusalem is eternal, unshakable and unequivocal.

Nous, soussignés, dévoués à la paix et respectueux des autres confessions, jugeons qu'il est vital en ce moment particulier de réaffirmer notre attachement à Jérusalem, coeur et âme du peuple juif.

Nous revendiquons le lien permanent et éternel qui existe entre Jérusalem et le peuple juif, aussi bien historiquement, en tant que capitale nationale d'Israël, que spirituellement comme pierre angulaire du judaïsme.

Nous révérons Jérusalem comme le lieu le plus saint de notre foi, ainsi que le Har-Habayit, site de notre Ancien Temple, notre lieu le plus sacré.

Nous célébrons Jérusalem, qui depuis trois mille ans, n'aura été la capitale spirituelle et territoriale que du peuple juif.

L'histoire contemporaine a clairement démontré que seule une Jérusalem unifiée sous souveraineté israélienne a pu garantir la liberté de culte et le libre accès aux lieux saints des différentes confessions.

Le lien entre le peuple juif et une Jérusalem unie est éternel, inébranlable et sans équivoque.

Multi-tasking rabbi finds time for community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl is initially reticent about his Jewish community involvement, downplaying his distinction as the only rabbi in Canada among 25 North Americans honoured last November with a rabbinical award at the General Assembly of United Jewish Communities in Chicago.

"I think I'm an ordinary guy," he demurred in a recent interview, ensconced in a wing chair in his spacious study at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

A six-year board member of Toronto's Jewish federation until his recent resignation, he has helped with special projects, served as a resource on an individual basis and urged congregants not to curtail their commitments to UJA at times when the situation in Israel provoked frustration among Diaspora Jews – nothing he believes is terribly unusual.

Aside from his duties as senior rabbi of North America's largest Conservative congregation, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl is chairing the upcoming Rabbinical Assembly (RA) convention, to be held here in June for the Conservative movement's rabbinic umbrella organization.

A board member of Mazon Canada and Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, the rabbi is also a member of the RA's committee on Jewish law and standards.

He is involved in interfaith work and Synagogue Transformation and Renewal (STAR), the latest major initiative of philanthropists Edgar Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt and recently deceased Charles Schusterman.

And, as if he weren't already a man of many hats – or kippot – Rabbi Frydman-Kohl is working on a PhD thesis on medieval philosophy, six chapters of which lay in a folder atop his desk during the interview.

When the rabbi's synagogue and community interests overlap, it's likely not coincidental. "[Beth Tzedec] has taken a leadership role in developing an adult education program in conjunction with UJA FEDERATION and the Conservative movement," he noted, citing one example.

"Even a synagogue like Beth Tzedec, which has many of the resources to go it alone, should look towards partnerships," he said with characteristic deliberation, "because it's only in these bridging relationships that we actually create the kind of community we dream about."

How does the Chicago native, who turns 50 next month, find time for his multiple commitments?

"I just do," he shrugged, his manner remarkably unhurried for someone who had sandwiched this interview between a preschool classroom visit that ended up being delayed, and a meeting several kilometres away for which he would undoubtedly be late.

Alan Sandler, president of Toronto's Jewish federation and a longtime Beth Tzedec congregant, lauds the rabbi for his understanding, his willingness to communicate across denominational lines, and his commitment to Jewish education and Israel, where the Frydman-Kohl family spends time every summer.

"He's a very warm, open person," said Sandler. "His advice is sage, and he does not give in on his principles."

From a federation perspective, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl "provided us with a tremendous amount of Judaic input in a lot of difficult decisions," Sandler added.

The rabbi has compelling personal reasons to make community a priority, having been a beneficiary years ago.

"Growing up, I was a child at risk," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl recalled. He and his divorced mother lived precariously, hovering below and just above the poverty line.

"I always think that the agencies, the schools and the synagogues of the Jewish community in Chicago that kept my mother and me afloat were very important. I was nurtured by the community, and I was sustained by the community, and as I grew up I naturally was involved in the community."

The path that led Rabbi Frydman-Kohl to Toronto in 1993 included formative years in an Orthodox day school, as a Reform synagogue member, and as a participant in USY, the youth program of Conservative Judaism.

"Even though my home, so to speak, is in the Conservative movement, I've always felt connected to all the movements, and I feel that every single one of them brings, in its own way, benefits to Jewish life."

His late father, whom he got to know only as an adult after his mother died, was part of an "exceptionally giving and philanthropic family," he said. The rabbi's father, in his youth, was also a beneficiary of the Jewish community, when he was given kosher food aboard a train bound for Siberia, after being captured by the Russians.

Giving, it seems, has been an ongoing theme in Rabbi Frydman-Kohl's life. As an undergraduate, he studied at Northwestern University in Evanston, Ill., in a program that trained teachers to work in urban ghettos. With the rise of the civil rights movement, however, the black community no longer wanted assistance from whites.

"I took [the message to help my own community] very much to heart," said the rabbi, who was a Soviet Jewry and anti-Vietnam war activist as a student.

He was even arrested once, but the record has been expunged, he said. Ironically, he was also involved in demonstrations against the Jewish Federation of Chicago, on behalf of increased funding for Jewish education.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl was ordained in 1977 from the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary – under whose auspices he is working on his PhD – but neither his smichah nor his new UJC award can be found on his study walls.

There is, however, an unframed typewritten essay hanging unobtrusively near his office door. Written by a young congregant in the Albany synagogue the rabbi served for 17 years, its subject is the boy's hero, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

ארץ מרגשת

טסתי לישראל בשבוע האחרון של דצמבר. המטוס היה מלא בעיקר בנו, הישראלים, שאינם נרתעים מהשמועות, יודעים להבדיל בין אמת ואגדה. הארץ רועשת גועשת על עניין המשא ומתן, וחצעות החלוקה של ירושלים גורמות לחלוקת העם לשני מחנות גדולים . ואני, כמו תמיד מצאתי סיבות להתרגש מחן. בבואי נערך מבצע שירותרום לגיוס תרומות לרווחת החיילים. והנה לקראת סוף המופע מקפרים את סיפורו של חייל בודד ממוצא אתיופי, שאין משפחתו נמצאת בארץ, שנהרג בפעולה צבאית לפני חודשים מספר. לספר את סיפורו מעלים לבמה שני חיילים בודדים מוונצואלה ומדרום אפריקה שלחמו לצידו. ואז שואל אותם המנחה דן מרגלית מתי ראו לאחרונה את משפחותיהם. שני החיילים מודים בפנים עגומות שזה קרה לפני חודשים רבים. והימים ימי חנוכה, ומשפחות ישראל יושבות ביחד, ואתה מרגיש עצב עמוק כלפי החיילים הבודדים האלה. ואז עולה מסך ובני משפחותיהם שחובאו במיוחד לשידור הזה נכנסים לאולפן. ואתה יודע שבשנייה זו, בדיוק כמוך, מוילים דמעה עוד כמה מליון ישראלים שצופים בשידור. יש שם המון לב במקום הזה. אולי זה נשמע קצת קיטשי, אבל זה חסר לי כאן נורא. אבל שיישאר ביניו.

הפרדה מלאה-אפרן נפרי

"לגידי שלום רב. קראתי את קביעתך על 'הפרדה מלאה'. אולי זה נשמע לא קביל, אבל אתה צודק, יש לעשות הפרדה, לא הפרדה מלאה, אבל כמעט מלאה. יש לקיים שתי מדינות נפרדות עם שטחים רצופים ולא עם רצועות נפרדות וכבישים עוקפים,דבר הגורם לחיכוכים ולהתנגשויות בלתי נמנעות. יש לנתק מיד לאחר החסכם את כל ההתנחלויות והיישובים הבודדים ולהשאיר רק גושי יישובים עם קשר רצוף לישראל. יש לשים את הדגש על חינוך הילדים, על הבנה וסובלנות. רק אם יקבלו שני הצדדים, ובעיקר הצד הפלשתינאי, עקרונות אלה, יהיה סיכוי לשלום אמת. התנהלך החסטורי קובע שעל שני העמים לחיות זה בצד זה, ואין דרך אחרת אלא למצוא את שביל הזהב."

לתהליך השלום אויבים רבים-עזק אסף

WHO WAS CHAIM WEIZMANN?

Dr. Chaim Weizmann was born in 1874 in Motol, in the Russian Pale of Settlement. In 1898, he was awarded a Ph.D. from the University of Fribourg, Switzerland. He married Vera Khatzman in 1906 and in 1907 visited Palestine for the first time. In 1915-16 he discovered a new method for the production of acetone and moved to London. He laid the foundation stone of the Hebrew University on Mount Scopus in Jerusalem in 1918. In 1921 he toured the United States with Albert Einstein and was elected President of the World Zionist Organization. He opened the Daniel Sieff Research Institute in Rehovot, Israel in 1934 and decided to make Rehovot his home. On February 16, 1949, the Knesset formally elected Chaim Weizmann to be the first President of the State of Israel. On November 2, 1949, the Weizmann Institute of Science, of which the Daniel Sieff Research Institute is the nucleus, was inaugurated, and Dr. Chaim Weizmann, a world-renowned chemist, was elected the first President of the Weizmann Institute. He served as its President until his death on November 9, 1952 at his home in Rehovot.

"I FEEL SURE THAT SCIENCE WILL BRING TO THIS LAND BOTH PEACE AND RENEWAL OF ITS YOUTH, CREATING HERE THE SPRINGS OF A NEW SPIRITUAL AND MATERIAL LIFE... I SPEAK OF SCIENCE FOR ITS OWN SAKE AND APPLIED SCIENCE."

Toronto teen may visit Buckingham Palace

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beth Cole can boast about something that few Toronto teens can; she has a chance to go to Buckingham Palace.

Cole, 18, an OAC student at Havergal College, recently received a medal in the gold category of the Duke of Edinburgh's Award.

Beth Cole with her gold medal.

Launched as the Duke of Edinburgh's Award for Boys in 1956 by Prince Philip, the medals are now available to young men and women ages 14 to 25 who complete activities in four areas including service, expeditions and explorations, skill, and physical recreation.

There are three separate awards – bronze, silver and gold – and participants may enter at whatever level is most suited to them. Anyone interested can participate, either on their own or through their school or youth organization.

Cole, who plans on studying science at university, signed up for the awards two years ago, after being encouraged to do so by her teacher.

"They recognize people who take part in all-round activities, and that is something I have always done. It also encourages people to take part in a variety of activities."

Cole wins gold Duke of Edinburgh award

The advantage, she says, is that participants are not competing with each other. "They do not have to be the best. They just have to try hard. If they do more activities, they receive a higher award.

"They are also broader than most other awards. We have to take part in sports, community service – a variety of activities," she says.

She had taken part in the March of the Living and was a volunteer at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care before she signed up for the awards, she said.

"I just like to fill my time with useful activities. I went on the March of the Living – which fulfilled the awards expeditions and explorations requirement – because I had not studied the Holocaust at school. I had read a lot of books about it, but I wanted to learn more.

"On that trip we saw the worst of the worst, and then we took part in Israel's 50th anniversary celebrations. It was an unbelievable contrast. It is something that will stay with me forever."

Now a volunteer at the Sunnybrook campus of Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre where she works with dialysis patients, Cole also plays the French horn, teaches skiing – she is a level 1 ski instructor – and is on the school's rowing team. From March until June, she gets up at 4:45 a.m. to be at Cherry Beach by 5:30 a.m., where she rows until 7:30 a.m.

Although she has already received a pin for completing her requirements, she can still receive the medal from a member of the Royal Family.

This can be done when a member of the family comes to Canada, or if she goes to Buckingham Palace when an awards ceremony is taking place. "I'm just thrilled about meeting a Royal Family member. I did not enter because of that, but it is certainly a great perk."

Jewish, Catholic relations see rapprochement

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the Middle East spilled over into violence and mutual recriminations, a group of Canadian Christian activists struggled over a document that would address the conflict from their churches' perspectives.

Meeting as the Middle East Working Group, an offshoot of the Canadian Council of Churches, the coalition experienced major disagreements over the document's language.

Special Feature

On the one side were those, led by the United Church, who pushed for a position critical of Israel; at the other end of the spectrum, led by the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches, were those who worked to soften the document's harshest language.

Jewish interlocutors, who viewed a draft copy of the document, "saw red," said Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of religious and inter-religious affairs for Canadian Jewish Congress. "It absolutely pointed the finger at Israel as being the culprit in this issue."

In the end, Rabbi Bulka and Congress agree the final document is one they can live with.

Called Canadian Christian Leaders Call for Peace with Justice in the Middle East, the recently released document does not lay blame for the conflict. Although it calls for the Israeli withdrawal from settlements in Gaza and the West Bank, it also calls for "non-violence and negotiation," the recognition of Israel's legitimacy and security, and for Jerusalem to remain "open and accessible to the people of the three faiths that hold it sacred."

"It is not a document we would take exception to," said Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of the Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"Our concerns have been that a number of Christian churches' tilt has definitely been against Israel. But what we have found encouraging is that the Roman Catholic Church has played a role in trying to mitigate that, to soften any statement," said Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The Roman Catholic church has played a constructive role in encouraging fairness and balance."

Jewish participants in inter-denominational relations are not surprised the Roman Catholic Church proved among the friendliest to Jewish concerns about Israel. The Church has been experiencing a revolution in its thinking about Jews, a change that can be traced back to World War II.

It's trite to say the Holocaust was a landmark event in Jewish history, but it also shook the Christian world to its theological core.

In the aftermath of the Shoah, the Roman Catholic church and other major Christian denominations began to re-evaluate their teachings of contempt that, many theologians concluded, helped lay the foundation for the mass murder of Jews.

Today's Catholic Church is quite different from the one of 30 years ago, let alone that of World War II, Catholic and Jewish theologians agree. Led in large part by the current Pope, but preceded by a number of developments that reach back to the 1960s, the Church has taken steps towards a rapprochement with the Jews while cultivating a more respectful attitude to its "older brother" in faith.

In some respects, "Jews are in" among many Catholics. "They really are," said Rabbi Michael Stroh, who is teaching a course in modern Jewish thought at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto.

The results can be seen today in warm relations with Jews, co-operative alliances on topics of mutual concern and in the intense interest among many Catholics in the Jewish roots of their faith.

During the pontificate of John Paul II, who grew up among Jews and who speaks Yiddish, the church has taken a number of steps to improve its relationship with Jews. It has condemned anti-Semitism as a sin.

The Pope set an unmistakable example for his Catholic flock when he travelled to Israel and prayed at the Western Wall. The Pope paid homage to the victims of the Holocaust at Yad Vashem and he has issued an apology for centuries of anti-Semitic persecution by members of the Church.

In the Catholic Church, where major changes can take decades, these developments have operated at a breakneck pace.

A seminal event took place in 1965 when the Vatican under Pope Paul VI issued Nostra Aetate (In Our Time), a document that rejected collective Jewish guilt for the death of Jesus, abhorred anti-Semitism and recognized that "God holds the Jews most dear for the sake of their Fathers..."

In 1998, Pope John Paul II issued We Remember: A Reflection on the Shoah, which condemned anti-Semitism and the Holocaust.

In October 2000, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops (CCCB) issued its own document, Jubilee: Renewing our Common Bonds with the Jewish Community. Released after Montreal Rabbi Howard Joseph led the bishops in a "reflection" and prayer adapted from the Yom Kippur service, Jubilee calls for a relationship based on "understanding, peace and mutual respect."

Co-operative alliances on topics of mutual concern

Around the same time in late 2000, the National Jewish Scholars Project, an inter-denominational group of thinkers, published Dabru Emet (Speak the Truth). It was designed as a response to steps taken in the Christian world to acknowledge God's covenant with the Jewish people and to improve relations with the Jewish people.

The rapprochement between Roman Catholics and Jews does not appear to be limited to the ivory tower environments of scholars and religious leaders. There are grass roots manifestations of the new relationship as well in some communities.

For the past several years in North Bay, Peter Baker has served as a sort of ambassador of the Jewish people to the Roman Catholic community. A teacher by profession, he has fielded numerous requests from Catholic friends and acquaintances to lecture on the Judaic origins of Christianity and to present a Jewish perspective on Bible stories.

Baker, a native of Toronto, has been happy to do so and is gratified that the sessions are well attended. His audience, he finds, is fascinated by the links between early Christianity and Judaism. Last spring, 40 of them took up an offer to drive down to Toronto to view a traditional Shabbat service in one of the city's Conservative shuls.

Roman Catholic interest in things Jewish is not uncommon in Toronto as well. Every year, Roman Catholic and other churches hold well-attended "seders" (of varying Jewish content) around Passover. One congregation in mid-Toronto followed up a seder with a visit to a Reform temple to view Shabbat services.

Meanwhile, hundreds of Catholic students file through the Holy Blossom Temple each year as part of world religion class that introduces them to other faith groups.

The connections go on: during the annual Holocaust Education Week in Toronto, churches representing a variety of denominations host memorial events to commemorate the Shoah and reflect on the Christian world's role in the tragedy. During the school year, hundreds of Catholic students visit the Holocaust Memorial and Educational Centre in the Lipa Green Building as part of their education into that tragic period.

Dialogue groups meet regularly and last June,18 rabbis and 18 Catholic priests met in a study day to discuss issues that concern both communities, such as intermarriage. "It was clear that this was something Alyosius Cardinal Ambrozic favoured," said Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who organized the study day. "It was the first public action [the Cardinal] has taken to show an interest in Christian-Jewish dialogue."

In the days before Nostra Aetate, it would have been hard to imagine this level of interaction and respect emanating from the church towards Jews and Judaism, observers agree.

Canadian Jews with long memories recall the taunt of "Christ-killers" that greeted them all too often from Christian neighbours, while those who grew up in European countries with a strong Church presence recall anti-Semitism as a fact of life. Contempt for Jews as murderers of God and heirs to a religion that had been superceded by Christianity was taught as a matter of course in Catholic schools.

Pope credited with improved relations with Jews wide the doors to Jewish/Catholic reconciliation, some points of friction remain. The beatifications of Pope Pius XII, Edith Stein and Spain's Ferdinand and Isabella, who sponsored the Inquisition, anger many Jews. The Vatican's statement that Jerusalem should be internationalized and the Pope's recent meeting with Austrian extremist Joerg Haider have also been questioned by Jewish leaders.

But Rabbi Tanenbaum, who has been engaged in interfaith dialogue for 30 years, acknowledged these "insults" are "not enough to derail the improving relationship."

Prutschi agrees. Compared to 20 or 30 years ago, "no question, there's been a great deal of progress," he said.

Nostra Aetate "was a massive breakthrough," said David Hart, chair of the interfaith committee at the Holy Blossom Temple for the past 30 years. "It took a long, long time to penetrate its way down. The concept of accepting others as legitimate, it took a long time to get there, but we're finally getting there."

"These really are the best of times so far in terms of Jewish-Christian relationship, especially Jewish Roman Catholic relations," said Father Damian MacPherson, director for ecumenism and interfaith affairs for the Archdiocese of Toronto.

"Most of it has come as a result of the papacy of John Paul and his visit to the Holy Land."

"In our church, the relations and awareness of the bonds that link us to our Jewish roots have been improved and are much greater than five or six years ago," said Bishop Jean-Louis Plouffe of Sault Ste. Marie, chair of the commission for ecumenism for the National Conference of Bishops.

"Now, there is a renewed interest in our people to get to know more about Judaism and to get into closer dialogue and [cooperate] on more projects," he said.

The relationship between Jews and Roman Catholics has improved to such an extent that subjects that might have been kept secret for fear of embarrassment are now being discussed openly.

"We've moved from likenesses, to differences, to pain," Rabbi Tanenbaum said. "When we started the process, we were talking about how we're alike, what we share in the Bible."

That developed into discussions about differences in the faiths, a development that required "trust and courage on both sides," said Rabbi Tanenbaum.

> Church has voiced its opposition to proselytizing efforts

Today, "we have evolved into a new level where we can reveal our pain." For Christians that can mean acknowledging the historic teaching of contempt for Jews. For Jews, it can mean open discussions about Israel, including its inability so far to carve out peaceful relations with all its neighbours, he said.

Prof. David Novak, chair of Jewish studies at the University of Toronto and one of the authors of Dabru Emet, said major Christian figures had been making "conciliatory gestures" to Jews for some time. The authors of Dabru Emet "felt it was time the Jews responded to them."

The Roman Catholic Church as well as other churches have acknowledged and regretted "denigrating Jews and persecuting Jews. They want a new relationship with Jews. This has led to less anti-Semitism," Novak said.

"The Holocaust was very traumatic for Christians," he continued. "Many Christians are ashamed that many Christians participated in this horrendous crime, or were silent about it." As a result, they have rethought their anti-Jewish theology, he said.

(One of the more controversial statements in Dabru Emet that drew fire from Jewish critics, was that despite "the long history of Christian anti-Judaism and Christian violence against Jews"...Nazism itself was not an inevitable outcome of Christianity.")

Novak predicted that "relations will improve." Nostra Aetate "started a process to change Roman Catholic thinking. I can't conceive of going back to the bad old days.

"By any appreciable measure, anti-Semitism has rapidly declined and I attribute the attitude of the major Christian churches as a major reason for that," he added.

The improvement in relations has spawned other practical benefits as well.

In Ontario, the Catholic church has sided with Congress and Jewish parents with children in day schools in support of government funding for non-Catholic parents as well.

The Catholic Church has voiced its opposition to proselytizing efforts that target Jews, and the Church has been "very interested in Holocaust education," Prutschi said.

"We have worked through Congress and the [UJA FEDERATION] of Greater Toronto to jointly address with Roman Catholics the issues of cuts by government of funding for social services and the importance of preserving faith-specific institutions in the social services and health services sectors," he said.

"The Roman Catholics in particular have been very mindful of what Israel means to the Jewish people and what Israel faces in the Middle East. That's very interesting in that the Roman Catholics are on the ground in the Middle East," he said.

The Catholic Church's most recent pronouncement on its relations with Jews "is highly significant in that it's called Jubilee. They're reaching back into Jewish terminology to make a statement about Jews," Rabbi Tanenbaum said. The church is "trying to consider Jews in their own terms."

Like the United Church's document, Bearing Faithful Witness, "these are attempts to understand Jews in Judaism's terms. That's a pleasure, to be approached in your own terms," Rabbi Tanenbaum said.

"It goes beyond any statements by the Pope in his liturgy of apology, beyond the Pope's statements on Jerusalem. It builds on those statements and takes it further...This is a Canadian document that could have impact around the world."

Rabbi Tanenbaum believes the Catholic bishops' enunciation of church policy on the Jews has filtered down to the grass roots where it is having an impact on many parishioners. Church teachings are available in pamphlet form and priests can be expected to preach on it from the pulpit.

Rabbi Tanenbaum, however, believes more guidance could be forthcoming from Cardinal Ambrozic – a view shared by Rabbi Frydman-Kohl.

"If he [Ambrozic] made this his agenda, I'd surely know about it," Rabbi Tanenbaum said.

"He's not there yet," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl stated. "People at the parish level are more interested."

Father MacPherson believes Cardinal Ambrozic "was supportive of and encouraged by" the meeting of scholars that took place last year,. However he was not aware of any further efforts by the Cardinal to take part in Catholic-Jewish dialogue.

At St. Michael's, a private high school operated in Toronto by the Basilian Fathers, all 1,183 students take a religious studies program that includes exposure to the Old Testament, said Father Daniel Zorzi, the school's principal.

In Grade 11, students are offered a world religions course that examines Jewish holy books, Jewish festivals and 30 Jewish concepts, including Shabbat, Yom Kippur, Talmud and the oral law, Father Zorzi said.

Students are taught that "God established a covenant with the Jews that is still binding, that they are the Chosen People, that Christianity grew out of Judaism, that much of what we believe in Christianity has its roots in Judaism," said David Fischer, head of the school's department of theology and philosophy.

The course would include some current events, such as recent statements by the Pope and his visit to Israel. Fischer said he is familiar with the Church's current relationship with Jews and how it has taken steps to apologize for past injustices.

"The Church confessed that it did not always treat Jews with respect or as they should have, that there were times that Christians and Catholics have sinned in the way Christians treated Jews," he said.

Reflecting on the Pope's visit to Israel, Fischer said it had a big impact on him personally. "That was a tremendous event, seeing the Pope at the Western Wall. I know one of the Pope's goals was to establish positive relations with the Jewish people," he said.

The double cohort challenge – 4 teens face the future

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For the kids born in 1985, the year 2003 looms large.

In that year, two high-school graduating grades in Ontario will begin their pursuit of higher education as Grade 13 is phased out at the same time that the new-curriculumed Grade 12s complete their studies.

Coupled with the fact that, over the past few years, a demographic bulge of baby-boomers' children have now grown up and emerged out of high school ready for higher learning, competition for spots could be fierce.

Dave Roth, a spokesperson for the Ontario Ministry of Education, said that in the year 2003, the bulge will hit universities and colleges with an estimated 73,000 students. The bulge will continue until 2008 when 81,000 students are expected to arrive at the province's institutions of higher learning.

In order to get ready, the ministry's Web site notes that the government has invested $4 billion in post-secondary education in the past year – the highest level ever.

"Furthermore," Roth said, "in this year, we've added $69 million in funding to help colleges and universities handle more students and improve the quality of the programs they offer."

According to Roth, "the buildings are currently being built and the programs are currently being planned."

"However, while there has been an increased capital fund allocated for buildings, the use of those buildings has not yet been decided," Derek McCammond, the vice-provost of planning and budgeting at the University of Toronto, said.

McCammond noted that in order for the 2003 double-cohort students not to be adversely affected at U of T, operating funds need to be increased to go along with capital funds. And the current funding formula – which has been biased by an access to opportunities program used by the Ministry of Education – will increase funding only in certain academic areas.

The Ministry of Education's access to opportunities program is a three-year, $228-million investment intended to create 23,000 new opportunities for students in high-tech programs.

Indeed, Roth pointed out, when determining the funding of each academic institution, the ministry not only looks at the number of new student places that will be needed and the partnership funding in place, but it also looks at the demonstrated student demand for each program based on last year's demand and the extent to which projects fit into the long-term economic strength of the community.

So, at the University of Toronto, if admissions in a certain faculty were to fall even slightly, the university would lose funding in that faculty, McCammond said.

Liberal arts programs, such as English literature, philosophy and history will not do well with this type of funding formula. Programs which have benefited have been those in high-tech areas.

Special arrangements have been made with the faculties of computer science and engineering, McCammond said. Because of specific provincial needs, some professional areas have also been targeted for increased funding, such as the bachelor of education program. A slight increase in enrolment to medicine has also been made.

What does all this mean for those kids who are currently working their way through the system?

The answers aren't there yet. Roth notes that "the whole system is being looked at right now and four or five initiatives are currently being explored."

In the meantime, The CJN has chosen four different Jewish students who are currently in Grade 10 and will follow them for the next few years as they pursue their post-high school aspirations.

Noah Buckman is currently a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT). Before CHAT, he attended Faywood Elementary School and then the Claude Watson School for the Arts.

Noah's main concern about the double cohort year is the competition for university spots.

"The past couple of years, I've been really sure of the direction I want to head in – medicine."

Noah, who plays hockey seven times a week, feels that he is going to focus on maths and sciences in school now.

"It would have been nice to be able to wait before making decisions about my future career, but I don't want to be unprepared."

The evolution of discipline

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Discipline in the classroom has changed over the years.

"Things are much more different today than years ago," says Debbie Gans, an educator for more than 30 years and principal of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate.

"There is a more relaxed attitude to discipline," she told The CJN.

Lines of authority, respect and the relationship between students, teachers and parents are not as clearly defined.

"In earlier generations, these were set," Gans says. "We had a shared understanding of what was appropriate and what the expectations were. Nowadays, students have a different perspective on what their rights are and how they should relate to adults. I am sometimes taken aback at what students will say to a teacher or to me."

Gans adds that at one time, when an adult told a child to do something, it wasn't questioned. She believes that today's world is open and young people are exposed to many influences, particularly the media.

"There is a disintegration of traditional families," Gans says. "There are more single parent families, immigrant families where parents have two and three jobs, and families where both parents work.

"Parenting is one of many priorities now. Therefore, children are more of a challenge. And today, children are coming of age earlier. They are encouraged to be adults at 12 or 13."

For teachers, this is much more challenging. Teachers work hard to establish open lines of communication, Gans says.

"We must treat students with respect and dignity. You must give them the same type of respect that you expect."

Gans believes that many parents are doing a great job "but they are finding it hard to set limits and show children that there are consequences." If they don't learn about limits early in life, it is harder to teach them later on. Often, it is easier to give in.

Staff at William Lyon Mackenzie have tremendous resources, Gans says. Social workers work with staff and parents, and the school has an intervention centre which works one on one in helping students with social, personal and academic issues that are impeding their progress in a regular classroom.

Ricky Goldenberg, an educator at the elementary and middle level schools for 32 years, and currently a principal at Amesbury Middle School, says that tension has been created in Ontario's schools because of the demands placed on both teachers and students.

"We are compacting the curriculum – 5 years into 4 – and that creates a lot of stress," Goldenberg says. "Also, kids have… greater expectations and [are] therefore more demanding."

To cope with discipline problems, says Goldenberg, what is important is to have a partnership between the parents and the school.

"Kids need to know that you are listening and that teachers care. And teachers must clearly outline their expectations and routines."

Some of the difficulties today, Goldenberg adds, are the pressures put on teachers who are coping with longer hours. "This causes a lot of stress at work."

Goldenberg is concerned because she hears more and more younger teachers talking about retirement.

DJC committed to Jewish education

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Four years ago, a handful of interested parents met in Debbie Plested's living room and decided to start a Jewish studies program in the Riverdale area.

They were all members of the newly formed Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), a grassroots, liberal egalitarian congregation in Toronto's east end, established in 1996.

Plested, co-chair of the DJC education committee, said children's education was a priority for many DJC members.

"We were really a community," she said. "We wanted our kids to learn and study within our community and feel a part of the community."

Plested said the group recognized the necessity of setting up a program that could meet the diverse educational needs of the children.

Now in its third year, the DJC Children's Jewish Studies program runs weekly classes for 42 children in Grades 1 to 6 out of a local school. The program is co-ordinated by Shereen Sarick and staffed by four teachers and one teaching assistant.

One of the sources of funding was tuition fees, Plested said.

Another was a grant the DJC received from the New York based Jewish Connection Partnership, an organization that funds unaffiliated, interfaith congregations, she said.

Plested stressed the importance of the support and guidance the DJC received from the Bloor JCC and UJA FEDERATION, who brought them to the Jewish Connection Partnership, Plested said.

"We received a major grant from the Partnership… in our first year. We would not have been able to hire a co-ordinator and develop as rich a curriculum without the support."

Through discussion, debate, music, drama and art, the children study Hebrew, Torah, Jewish history and current events, Jewish holidays and rituals, Plested said.

"Our program values Judaism as a dynamic, living religion. Our students learn to understand what it means to be a Jew and how being Jewish affects our values, beliefs and behaviour."

The goal of the Hebrew language program is to help the children learn to read Hebrew, recite the basic prayers and gain familiarity with Hebrew songs, she said.

"We want the children to be able to decode Hebrew so that they'll be able to prepare for their bat or bar mitzvah… If they have more of an interest in conversational Hebrew, we encourage and assist them [with] supplementing their studies by connecting them with a tutor," program co-ordinator Sarick said.

In addition to the school, the DJC runs a B'nai Mitzvah program – this year there are 13 participants – and it has a close association with the Hebrew heritage program, which is now geared to JK and SK students.

The heritage program is the feeder program for the DJC school, Plested said. "It's a natural connection. Although they are funded and managed independently, the two programs maintain a strong connection.

"The Hebrew heritage teacher is an active member of the education committee and the Hebrew heritage students are included in our activities whenever appropriate, like holiday celebrations and special events," Plested said.

The B'nai Mitzvah program, which is run by parents, is not funded by any group, DJC chair Marlee Wyman said. "The children enrolled this year meet with a wonderful teacher every other weekend in one of their homes for two hours of discussion.

"This group is the beginning of a connection to the community for the future because the kids are building friendships and bonding as a group," Wyman said.

She said the DJC hopes to forge a stronger connection between the B'nai Mitzvah program and the school. "But we found that this format – a Sunday evening rather than after school – works best for this age group."

Wyman said she marvels at the growth of the community education program.

"It shows you what a group of dedicated volunteers can accomplish. They're incredibly motivated. That's the whole thing about volunteerism, action is taken because we want to see results."

We must not be complacent, says Epstein

Special education and supplementary high-school in the works for BJE

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A $1 million grant will enable the Board of Jewish Education to fulfil its goal of putting a Jewish education within the reach of even children with special needs, a pleased Seymour Epstein told The CJN in a recent interview.

Epstein, executive director of The Board of Jewish Education and vice-president for Jewish education and vice-president of UJA FEDERATION, said that the money will be donated over four years.

It used to be "commonplace to think that the double load meant that Jewish education was only for the top student – and certainly not for one who had special needs."

Now, however, he said, there is a greater awareness and interest on the part of all members of the education community – parents, teachers, boards and administrators. "They are now openly looking for ways to help the situation."

As well, the provincial government has promised some financial assistance. "That galvanized us to become more organized," Epstein said.

The board now has a committee studying special education, which will report in the middle or the end of July. This committee will "let us know what it will take to help efficiently."

A new co-ordinating body is being formed that will be called Tikkun Chaim, Epstein said.

The $1 million grant will be combined with money from UJA FEDERATION.

The study and the infusion of money will mean that "there will be a serious improvement [in special education] in the next year or two," Epstein said.

While the situation in Toronto is good compared to some other places, said Epstein, nevertheless "we have a lot of ground to cover." On the other hand, we have a "good base to start with, and good attitudes to help."

Seymour Epstein

Another innovation the BJE is planning for next year is a supplementary high school, which will be called Tichon Toronto.

"The city is unbalanced," Epstein said. While CHAT, the community high school is "one of the best in the world, and its new stream is a model for other communities," that only makes the picture for supplementary schools "sadder. There is almost nothing available" for high school age children.

"An overwhelming number of kids have practically no contact with Jewish life – not in synagogues, youth groups, camps, or school.

"They are like a child who only knows third grade math," Epstein said. "Their notions are childlike. Jewish life suffers [when this happens]. It is indifference fed by ignorance."

The school, which Epstein forsees opening either in September 2001 or 2002, with some elements beginning this fall, will be based most likely located at the Lipa Green building – perhaps in the Latner Jewish Public Library – and at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre. There will probably be satellites in synagogues.

There will be formal study, activity groups, such as crafts or sports, social action, experiential components like Shabbat retreats and possibly even a sort of outward bound. The possibilities are endless, he said.

Epstein plans a level of self-government so that the participants "have to have a sense that they are creating their own curriculum."

Tichon Toronto will "thrive or die" based on "the personality of a full-time director who will be hired," Epstein acknowledged.

The target population will be primarily those with Conservative or Reform backgrounds, he expects. There may even be CHAT students who are looking for "something more."

Those programs that are currently going on will be incorporated into Tichon Toronto, Epstein said.

Epstein expects the school to be "pluralistic, community oriented and stressing common values. It is very exciting."

Turning to more general concerns, Epstein said that he is worried that elementary day and supplementary enrolment isn't growing at that rate that demographics suggest they should be.

While he recognizes that the high cost can be a deterrent for young parents, "People must pick their priorities."

However, UJA FEDERATION realizes that for those with middle incomes, tuition can be a serious burden. "It [UJA] has allotted $7 million for subsidies, and hopes that this year's campaign will let us increase that."

This will, Epstein said, relieve some of the pressure on the schools. They will be able to use the money they have for educational purposes, rather than mainly for subsidies.

"Education is not static," Epstein mused. "It has to change to meet the changing world. We must not fall into a trap of complacency."

The only leading American university with a Jewish heart.

At the heart of Yeshiva University are its undergraduate colleges–Yeshiva College, Stern College for Women, and Sy Syms School of Business. Here students pursue a dual curriculum that combines rigorous requirements in the liberal arts and sciences with a parallel program of Jewish studies. The workload is substantial, but so are the rewards. Graduates are prominent in many fields and communal organizations.

Yeshiva is one of the leading academic centers in the U.S., rated one of the nation's top 50 research universities according to U.S. News & World Report. It is home to the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, the Ferkauf Graduate School of Psychology, and the Wurzweiler School of Social Work. Outstanding graduate and professional programs are offered at the Bernard Revel Graduate School and the Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration.

Rabbinic training and instruction are provided by the affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, along with professional training of cantors and courses in Jewish liturgical music at the Philip and Sarah Belz School of Jewish Music. There are also two affiliated high schools.

How can one institution excel across such a broad range? By embodying the centuries-old commitment of the Jewish People to learning, continuity, and the advancement of human knowledge. Yeshiva University is today a unique and vital resource for the Jewish community and for the wider world.

Currently, more than 100 Canadian students are enrolled in our schools and affiliates. If you'd like to know more, we'd welcome your call.

Lobby groups unite to fight for govenment funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The ongoing battle for public funding of Jewish day schools in Ontario took on a national and even international flavour over the past year, with one federal politician weighing in on the issue and Canada getting its knuckles rapped for not correcting it.

It's almost a year now since Canada responded to a United Nations finding that Ontario discriminates by funding Catholic schools and not those of other religions. The world body had given Canada 90 days to say how it would correct the inequality, which had been described by the UN's human rights committee in November 1999, in response to a complaint by Toronto Jewish parent Arieh Waldman.

Canada's terse reply, delivered in Geneva Feb. 3, 2000, was that under our Constitution, education is a provincial matter, and that since Ontario was unwilling to extend funds to private schools, Ottawa's hands were tied.

Canada added that it would continue to affirm its commitment to "the international human rights regime."

The response was blasted by faith groups and parents of children in religious schools as mealy-mouthed and wholly unacceptable. Canada was being hypocritical, they argued, for calling on other countries to respect human rights while the rights of non-Catholics in Ontario were being trampled on.

Almost immediately, a veritable alphabet soup of lobby and grassroots groups sprang up: There was Ontario Parents for Equality in Education Funding (OPEEF); Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF); Parents for Educational Choice (PEC); and the Ontario Alliance of Jewish Schools (OAJS). The multi-faith Coalition for Justice in Educational Funding included Canadian Jewish Congress.

They joined the 16-year-old Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), an arm of Congress, in lobbying Queen's Park for tax dollars for Jewish day schools.

But a few months ago, something historic happened: The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS) was unveiled, bringing the lobby groups together under one umbrella and eventually, every one of the 40 or so Jewish day schools in this province, which run the entire spectrum from Reform to chassidic.

Feb. 27 meeting to organize OAJDS

"It's a tremendous achievement," enthuses Yisroel Janowski, a one-time day school principal who headed the group's steering committee. "It will be the first time all Jewish day schools in the province will be represented by a single voice."

The OAJDS, which closely resembles a similar body in Quebec, will meet Feb. 27 to elect its first board of directors and come up with by-laws and a mandate.

Janowski stresses that the new group will not lobby the government directly for funds.

"We represent the schools. We're not a lobbying organization. That will continue to be up to Congress and B'nai Brith. We will provide direction and consultation to those lobby groups, and once funding is in place, we will be at the table representing Jewish day schools."

Provincial Funding of Private, Independent and Faith-Based Schools in Canada – 1998-1999

Province	Basic per-student funding	Formula	as a % of the public schools' operating cost
British Columbia	$2,738	50% of operating costs of the local public school district in the previous year.	50%
Alberta *	$1,902	Formula essentially undefined	Approx. 39%
Saskatchewan	$1,884	40% of per-pupil grant	Approx. 32%
Manitoba	$2,839	50% of the net operating expenditures for public schools two years previously	50%
Quebec	Preschool: $2,297 Primary school: $2,192 Secondary School: $3,067		53% 55% 61%

* Alberta: Schools began receiving 60% of the basic instruction grant in September, or $2,433 per funded student. This translates into roughly 50% of the average operating costs in public schools. Saskatchewan: Funding is only available to "Historic High Schools." There is no direct provincial funding for independent elementary schools. Data courtesy of the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools

Funding election issue

The whole issue was thrust onto the national stage in last autumn's federal election campaign. Canadian Alliance leader Stockwell Day, who aggressively courted the Jewish vote, became the first leader to make funding part of his election platform.

Day, a one-time administrator of a fundamentalist Christian school, decried the treatment of religious minorities in Ontario and promised to circumvent provincial intransigence with an income tax credit of up to $6,250 a year – the amount Queen's Park spends per Catholic and public school pupil.

Jewish voters tended to favour the Liberals in the election, but at least the message was heard in Ottawa and the campaign for funding received a much-needed shot in the arm, community leaders said.

Fueling the community's sense of frustration on this file is that two solutions are possible – one federal and one provincial –

Ontario stance may not be entrenched and neither seems forthcoming any time soon.

Indeed, the province has dug in its heels. At one point, education minister Janet Ecker, obviously tiring of the issue, said that under no circumstances will Ontario fund private schools – "Period. End of story." She said the UN could say what it wants about Canada.

Strictly speaking, the UN's decision is not binding. There are no mechanisms that can be used to punish countries for violating the 1976 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which Canada signed in 1976, with the blessing of the provinces.

But Canada does stand to earn a black eye on the world stage as a human rights violator.

In June, the UN issued its annual Human Development Index, which again ranked Canada as the best place to live in the world. However, it took a direct swipe at this country by saying the index does not measure religious discrimination and that its rankings do not negate human rights violations.

And in July, a special UN official appointed to follow up on countries that have failed to implement decisions of the human rights committee called in two Canadian representatives for a dressing down. Canada's explanation was said to be unacceptable under Article 50 of the covenant, which prevents nations from sloughing off problems to their provinces or states.

For Canada to be lectured on human rights was discomfiting, not to mention surprising, to many officials.

That sentiment will likely be reinforced when the UN issues its annual report on human rights. Canada no doubt will be listed as a violator.

As far as Georgeanne Burke is concerned, the onus is on the province, not the federal government.

Burke, director of operations of OPEEF and JPEEF, said that although the issue made a big splash during the federal election, "we recognize that a solution lies in the hands of the province."

Over the past few months, many parents have made "significant" connections with MPPs, and the tide may be turning, Burke said.

"Instead of 'Can we do it?' we're hearing, 'How can we do it?' We're finding much more interest and acceptance [among elected officials]."

Ontario's stance may not be as entrenched as it seems. In 1992, the Tories produced a document titled A Blueprint for Learning in Ontario, which stated that the government "should be studying the funding systems of other North American jurisdictions and be prepared to consider all possible options, including an education voucher system."

Another indicator was last month's trial balloon floated by Michael Del Grande, the new chair of the Toronto Catholic District School Board. Del Grande said he envisions a system where his board would serve as the umbrella for all religious schools in Toronto.

There could be a public, secular school board alongside a religious board through which all faith-based schools would be funded. It would be administered by the Catholic board, Del Grande mused. That he added, could be a "novel, creative" answer to the UN.

Jordan Max, a communications volunteer with JPEEF, points out – "if you're into reading tea leaves" – that it's interesting to note Ecker's office did not denounce or even comment on Del Grande's remarks.

As well, Max points out, Queen's Park last month passed a bill to allow for private universities – perhaps another straw in the wind.

Meantime, parents of children in day schools are urged to maintain the pressure by writing and calling their MPPs.

"We're not going away," Max said.

Children with disabilities can find success at Zareinu and She'arim

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Moments after their first baby Cole was born, after a normal pregnancy, Debbie and Lorne Brass were shocked to find that despite weighing in at eight pounds, seven ounces, he had a weak cry and was swollen with fluid. He was a hydrops baby.

After five weeks of transfusions and many tests, Cole was diagnosed with a rare chromosome anomaly: the 18th chromosome was missing a piece. There are 360 diagnosed cases of this anomaly worldwide.

Few doctors at the hospital knew much about the unusual problem or its implications: would Cole ever walk? Would he ever talk?

Today, Cole is 3 ½ years old and walking well. He can speak, though not clearly, and he can count to 10.

Debbie Brass told The CJN that Cole's condition was hard to comprehend in the beginning. At first, their doctor did not give them much hope.

Brass says that you can lose faith because of the attitude of some doctors. "An accurate diagnosis is very important."

The Brasses were determined to search for proper services for Cole. York Region's early intervention services directed them to Zareinu Educational Centre's infant program.

"You find the strength," Debbie Brass says. "What doesn't kill us makes us stronger... I believe that Cole was given to us for a reason. I can't imagine our life without him. I'm sure God chose us for him."

Deborah (not her real name) was almost two years old when her parents began to suspect that there was a problem with their third and youngest child.

She was not speaking clearly, didn't sleep through the night and would burst out in temper episodes without a known cause.

Her parents began searching for answers.

"The doctors told us that you can't measure another child by the older children's yardstick. They told us not to overreact. But we continued to feel that it was more serious," Debora's mother said.

By the time Deborah was three and in nursery, the signs became more defined. "Deborah could not concentrate on activities for more than a few minutes. We decided to take her to a specialist. The neurologist confirmed that Deborah had a developmental problem and required special programs.

"We were devastated. Our world seemed to collapse. Despite our initial shock, we pulled together and with the help of a number of professionals, today, at the age of 12, Deborah is almost ready to enter the regular school system. She is a happy child and we accept her limitations. She brings us great joy."

Pat Resnick, preschool co-ordinator and integration specialist at Zareinu, a special needs school for children from infancy to elementary grades with a variety of developmental and/or physical challenges, says that when parents notice something is wrong with their child, they usually speak to their family doctor first. The doctor then refers them to a specialist.

"The diagnosis can be both frightening and overwhelming," Resnick says. She adds that at Zareinu "we emphasize intervention and try to help put the focus on what we can do for each child."

Carol Goldman, principal and co-ordinator at Zareinu, says that "when parents come to Zareinu, we consider [them] to be the greatest resource and an expert on their child's needs. We value their input and we work closely with [them]."

Some students are able to attend both Zareinu and be integrated into a regular school program concurrently.

Goldman says that parents go through stages of loss and grief. "It is a shattered dream – the dream that every parent has that a child will have all that they need in life to succeed and meet with success and fulfillment in life.

"We have to help them rebuild their dream," Goldman says. "We help parents see that small steps are important and help them to see their child's special qualities.

"We are inspired by the courage and determination shown by our students and their families. Miracles happen at Zareinu every day."

Kathy Manoim, principal of the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy, She'arim Hebrew Day School, agrees that early identification of a problem is vital.

She'arim offers a full Hebrew and general studies program for grades one to eight for children with average or above average intellectual ability but who are experiencing some learning difficulties.

In identifying learning difficulties, it is important to focus on the child's speech and motor development. Problems with motor development may indicate a child's difficulty in fine or gross motor areas. Children who have difficulties in expressing themselves or whose speech is difficult to understand may have a problem with their speech development.

"These symptoms may warrant further exploration by a speech pathologist," says Manoim.

Manoim also says if "the child may have difficulty dressing him or herself, trouble catching a ball, or running" that it is wise to follow up with an occupational therapist.

Some degree of anxiety is normal for preschool children who are separating from their parents probably for the first time in their lives. However, should a child be manifesting a heightened degree of anxiety, this should be explored further.

Conditions such as ADD (Attention Deficit Disorder) are difficult to diagnose when children are already very active. Manoim says that it is helpful to see if the child's behaviour is age appropriate by looking at the child in relation to other children in that age group.

When a child is compulsive or easily distracted, a structured program can be beneficial, Manoim says.

"At She'arim, we work with the child in conjunction with the family in providing a comprehensive program to meet [their] educational, social, behavioural, cognitive and emotional needs."

Adults can study mysticism, theology, davening & cooking

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Living in our vibrant, committed Jewish community means that we have no shortage of adult education courses from which to choose. Educational institutions, schools and synagogues offer a cornucopia of courses. A small sampling follows:

At Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, participants from beginners to advanced levels can try different subjects at the centre's "Taste of" series, a group of three-week classes.

"This series gives people an easy way to study new or unfamiliar topics. The courses are designed to whet your appetite and satisfy your craving for more understanding and Judaic knowledge," says Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel.

The courses, which run next in February and March, include Jewish Meditation, Midrash, Hebrew, Jewish Belief and Jewish Holidays.

Also coming up at Kolel is a one-night introductory class in Judaism, and a course for anyone considering conversion to Judaism, in the process of converting or who has converted.

Kolel's regular series of 10-week courses on everything from basic Judaism to advanced Talmud continue, and at Kolel cafe, which runs the last Sunday of the month, there are free classes and music. For information on all courses, call 416-485-7007.

Aish HaTorah, which calls itself "the university after university for Jewish learning," offers programs "for Jews with a thirst for knowledge and a longing for intelligent answers."

Winter classes at Aish HaTorah include a crash course in Hebrew Reading, the Laws of Shabbat, Advanced Talmud and Parshah of the Week.

Students can also learn to bake their own challah, learn how to kosher their kitchen for Passover, or take home-study classes. Women's classes include Mystical Pathways to Optimal Relationships, 48 Simple Ways to Happiness and the Jewish View on Love and Marriage.

Young professionals ages 19 to 33 can participate in an eight-week learning series titled It's What we Believe, Exploring the 14 Principles of Faith. For information, call 905-764-1818.

The Village Shul/Aish HaTorah Learning Centre is a vibrant learning community that offers classes, synagogue services and family events.

Morning classes in January and February include Understanding the Israel/Arab Situation, Working on the Ultimate Relationship, and Upgrading Your Parenting Skills to Handle Ages 10 and Up.

Evening courses range from Finding Fulfilment in Your Marriage to Hebrew reading, and there is Laugh 'n' Learn with Rabbi Yitzchak Feigenbaum. Call 416-785-1107.

The Forest Hill Jewish Centre is a learning centre located in the Spadina Village where people come in to use its diverse collection of Jewish books, learn in groups and participate in weekly learning programs and monthly Shabbatons.

It is an opportunity, says its brochure, to get reconnected and learn more about Judaism, and to meet other Jews. Call 416-483-0883.

Most Toronto-area synagogues offer adult education courses. At Adath Israel Synagogue, its Beit Midrash presents Siddur on Sunday, Shiur on Sunday and a lecture by Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jews for Judaism, titled Battle for the Jewish Soul.

Shaarei Shomayim Congregation runs a variety of courses, including Jewish Perspectives on Child Development, The Book of Judges; a Hebrew reading crash course, and Studying the Torah: Understanding the Keys that Unlock Biblical Interpretation.

Also at Shaarei Shomayim is the Mekorot Institute of Torah Study for Women, the Morning Institute for Torah Studies and a downtown Lunch & Learn.

At Holy Blossom Temple, adult education is ongoing. The Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning offers a number of lectures and courses including Shabbat Morning Torah Studies, Explorations in Jewish Law and Torah Cantillation.

Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi, runs an adult bar/bat mitzvah course, and annual lectures include the Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman lecture series, and the annual Alan Coatsworth Memorial lecture.

Or HaEmet teaches richness of Sephardic heritage

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

At 8:30 every morning, all the children's voices join together in song and prayer at Or HaEmet Sephardic School.

"This is one of the most beautiful differences you will find at Or HaEmet," Rabbi Amram Assayag said in an interview describing some of the features of the Sephardi curriculum used at the school.

"In terms of prayer, there are two aspects that are different for Sephardi Jews," he said. "There is a lot of song. We don't read or chant the prayers, we sing them.

"And the group tends to join together rather than have a chazzan lead them. There is a chazzan, but not as a soloist. The chazzan generally leads everyone together in song and prayer."

Rabbi Assayag, who is the director of the Jewish studies program at Or HaEmet, said that on special occasions, the students' voices are joined together with the help of the PA system, in order to teach the special tunes or the intricacies of the tfillot (prayers.)

"For example," he said, "during the month of Elul, the entire building will join together for a short rendition of Selichot."

"While the Ashkenazim say Selichot for one week, the Sephardim say Selichot for the entire month before Rosh Hashanah.

"It is important that a child who goes to this school will learn all aspects of tfillah that are unique to Sephardim, so that when the children go home and go to synagogue on Shabbat, they will be able to blend in with all the participants.

"The next aspect of our program which is different is Halachah (laws and customs)," Rabbi Assayag said. "Ashkenazi students coming here would see customs which are quite different from their own.

"And in this regard, while it is important that the emphasis is on Sephardi laws and customs, the students here also learn about the Ashkenazim and what they do.

"Then, if Sephardi students meet Ashkenazi Jews and they see them doing things differently, they won't think to themselves 'Oh, something isn't right here,'" Rabbi Assayag said.

"Personally, I believe that is what is missing from the other Jewish schools. Thirty years ago, when we first arrived in Canada, no one heard about us. But now, something should change.

"The third aspect of the program in our school is the lifestyles element. We don't do anything the same as anybody else. Our weddings are different, our brits are different.

Wedding scenes from Passages

"For example, you come to a brit milah here, and all kinds of poetry is sung together," he said. "A lot of these lifestyle customs have to be taught.

"We have an arrangement with the general studies department in which, every so often, the entire school participates in a lifestyles play. We go through the entire life cycle – from birth all the way up to, but not including, death."

In the most recent video of the play, titled Passages, each class focused on one of the life-cycle events specific to a Moroccan community.

Wearing colourful caftans, skirts, fezes, kerchiefs and hats, the children sing Middle-Eastern melodies as they recreate the traditions and lives from a century ago.

"Every six years, we repeat this program," Rabbi Assayag said, "so that it will never happen that a child has gone through the entire system and not participated in one of these plays.

"The educational elements of this play are amazing. There are no textbooks or teaching hours in a classroom that would give what this program gives."

In learning Jewish history, it is not until junior high that the classes begin to focus on the Sephardi experience, Rabbi Assayag noted.

"Before that, the students study general Jewish history. But in the higher grades, we begin to teach about the Golden Age in Spain and about the expulsion."

Istanbul Synagogue in Safed, Israel

The teachers prepare their own resources from books and doctorate materials, he said. There are plenty of books out there not meant for students, but they are good resources for teachers to prepare from.

"We also have an entire exposition [exhibit] that is available and has been prepared on boards, and we go through it with the students. That's when we go into where the Jews went after the expulsion."

Sarah Wasserman, the general studies principal, added that "all the major cities are covered in the exposition – the art, culture, the synagogues, maps and the history.

"We want the children to go through the entire spectrum of Sephardi lands and culture," Rabbi Assayag said. "Although most of the children here are Moroccans, we don't limit ourselves to Morocco. We want the children to know that there are different communities and that there are differences.

"Our school is just trying to give life to a glorious period of Judaism. It would be very easy for us to allow our children to melt in the pot. But that's not good for Jews.

"It's a mosaic and we have to keep it alive. We're trying to do our share to keep this segment of Jews very alive."

Secondary School. She attended a few different elementary schools, including the Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Dana really enjoys the arts, but she feels that her options will be limited if she pursues an arts degree.

"Right now, my main concern is learning and educating myself. If the opportunity arose to do something in vocals, I would do it.

"But that doesn't mean I would go to university to study music. By the time I get to university, I feel that I have to follow a path that will help me be secure."

Dana, who attended Camp Gesher last summer, also feel that it is important to develop her interests in Judaism.

Yonah Krakowsky is a student at Yeshivat Or Chaim. Prior to Or Chaim, he studied at Associated Hebrew Schools.

After Grade 12, Yonah would like to study for a year or two in Israel.

"After that, I would like to go to university.

"I don't know where," he said, "but I will go anywhere that I can afford to get the best possible education."

Yonah, who loves jazz and plays the saxophone, is also on his school basketball team. His interests include literature, public speaking and science.

"I don't know what I want to study after high school," he said. "I do know that I don't want to be stuck in front of a computer all day.

"I think it would be kind of fun to be prime minister."

Chana Libman went to Netivot HaTorah Day School before attending Ulpanat Orot Girls School.

"After high school I would like to spend a year in Israel and then go on to university.

"I have no idea what I would like to study," she said. "I feel that I have strengths in sciences and possibly maths. But I also like all the Hebrew subjects and English literature."

Chana's other interests include dance, gymnastics, swimming, skating and piano.

"If I could, I would do a more general degree in university. But if I had to, I would focus on science."

Yiddish expands to day schools

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

Yiddish is now being taught at some Jewish day schools in Toronto in addition to Bialik, which has always had Yiddish studies as part of its curriculum.

A Yiddish class at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) is under way, and afterschool classes have begun at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Demographers have noted that more than a million people will speak Yiddish by 2005, and that it is the 34th most spoken language in the world, said Adam Fuerstenberg, committee director for UJA FEDERATION's committee for Yiddish.

Most of the million are in chassidic families in North America and Israel, he added.

Both young and old are already studying Yiddish here. Yiddish is taught to children at the Winchevsky School on Cranbrooke Avenue, adult and children's classes are available through the committee for Yiddish, and there are programs for seniors.

Some 500 students at Bialik from age eight to graduation at age 14 are taking Yiddish as an integral part of the curriculum, said Dr. Uri Korin, director of education at Bialik. At the same time, he said, they are becoming acquainted with Jewish culture through their fluency in Yiddish, studying the works of Shalom Aleichem and I.L. Peretz.

At Bialik, as much time is spent on Yiddish as on French, and the students study in four languages – English, Hebrew, Yiddish and French.

Bialik celebrated 1,000 years of Yiddish last year with a presentation at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue about their program.

At CHAT, the class is taught for three hours a week by Ethel Cooper, a Yiddish teacher at Bialik and chair of the Yiddish committee of UJA FEDERATION.

Fourteen of the 17 students in the Grade 10 Yiddish class at CHAT have never taken the language before, said Cooper, who is convinced there is more interest in Yiddish today than even five years ago, because as survivors die, there seems to be more incentive to keep the language alive.

"It is interesting that Yiddish is not in the Jewish studies program at CHAT, but in general studies," she said.

Fuerstenberg said interest in Yiddish in Toronto is high, with the committee sponsoring adult classes in various synagogues. There is a class for children at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Sunday mornings, where spaces are still available. At the Beth Tikvah location, parents are also invited to learn Yiddish in a separate class.

Another highly successful adult Yiddish class is run by Adath Israel Synagogue and taught by Yiddishist David Newman.

At age 103, William Katz is still attending Yiddish classes at the Bernard Betel Centre and the Borochov Centre. The Polish-born centenarian came to Canada in 1920 and earned a living as an embroidery operator until his retirement.

"Katz is a purist when it comes to Yiddish," said Bookie Kwart, education co-ordinator at Bernard Betel. "When I was introducing the late Julie Sokoloff at the class, Katz finished [my introduction] because my Yiddish wasn't good enough. He is a gentleman's gentleman, exceedingly polite, and still lives alone in an apartment."

The two-hour class of 30 to 50 seniors at Bernard Betel concentrates on reading and discussion, and often sings Yiddish and Hebrew melodies. The class has been led for 17 years by a self-educated Yiddish teacher.

Bernard Betel also has a more informal Fun With Yiddish program every other Thursday afternoon, which was started in the past year. With videos and movies, the program attracts 30 to 55 people. Kwart estimates that 80 percent of Bernard Betel members speak Yiddish.

The committee for Yiddish is hopeful that it will initiate Yiddish in the Jewish Studies Department at York University and that it will expand the Yiddish content at the University of Toronto.

For more information about committee for Yiddish classes, call Fuerstenberg at 416-635-2883, ext 155.

Mercaz encourages educational inclusion

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

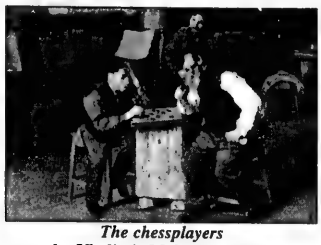
Inclusion of special needs children into the regular school system is a right, not a privilege, says the founder of Mercaz Harmony International Centre for Inclusion.

"Inclusion is a fact of life. Schools must be ready emotionally and physically to accept all children. We can accept inclusion grudgingly or with a challenge," says Joan Shrensky, who was in Toronto recently to speak to educators.

Shrensky founded Mercaz Harmony as a 13-child preschool 15 years ago, and has since guided its evolution into an international organization whose sole focus is inclusion of children with special needs.

Mercaz Harmony assists children with special needs to become valued members of their communities by providing them, their families, their non-disabled peers and their service providers with educational opportunities, supportive services, technical assistance and community awareness.

Its work involves programs that include the integrated model preschool in Jerusalem, a national outreach project in Israel and the international inclusion initiative.



The chessplayers
by Vladimir Makovsky 1891.

The original preschool, she says, has grown into a model that educates youngsters from the age of 18 months to six years. It now has 54 students, more than half of whom have disabilities.

"With a small teacher-to-student ratio that translates into lots of individual attention, plus supplementary therapies for those who require them, we are able to serve the needs of all our students. It is an example that is being followed in schools and communities everywhere."

Part of Shrensky's work is to consult with parents abroad who seek to include their children in Jewish schools and the Jewish community.

Putting similar types of people together in a [group setting] does not work, says Shrensky.

"Without others with whom to interact, [special needs] individuals do not develop fully. The inclusion movement gives a human voice to each of us."

Not all children will succeed in an inclusive setting, Shrensky says, "but inclusion will ensure that the percentage of successful children is [greater]. We want every child to have a feeling of success."

Educational facilities dedicated to the philosophy of inclusion must be committed and have defined policies in place, she says.

"Accessibility, flexibility and creativity must all be part of their policies. No one method will meet the needs of every child.

"Schools must [understand] the needs of each child and family, and create programs [accordingly]. They must learn to look at what is right about a child, not only what is wrong."

There are currently too few working examples of inclusion, Shrensky says, because many adults have fears that it may be harmful to the children or be too expensive.

"There are also fears of failure, and fears that the students will be afraid. It is often the adults who create the problems, not the children. If we deal with their fears, eventually the fears will diminish."

Mercaz Harmony's outreach project is based on need, she says. "We see the needs of the children, of the schools and of the community, and then we try to create a program. We evaluate a child, evaluate a school, and see if we can make a match.

"We run workshops and try to help schools take care of outstanding services. We can have someone on site at least once a week, and we are available by phone six days a week. If teachers know that we are available by phone, they may be more willing to try."

Although Mercaz receives Israeli government funding for some 40 percent of its operational budget, she says the balance must be covered by parent-paid tuition and contributions. There is no government support available for outreach.

Jamie Sherman, special education co-ordinator at Zareinu, a school for children with multiple disabilities, says that his school caters to a broad spectrum of children, "all of whom need to feel successful in their environment, need to feel a certain level of competence in their abilities, and need responsible inclusion."

Sarah Wasserman, general studies principal of Or HaEmet Hebrew Day School, says they have a program that has Zareinu students integrated into her school, which houses Zareinu.

"Special needs students take our programs at a modified pace with the assistance of Zareinu staff. This gives students the opportunity to work at their own level, but be mainstreamed in a regular classroom," she says.

Some Zareinu students are better equipped to handle the challenge than others, she says, "but it is a good program for everyone involved. It is good for special needs children to be with others, and it sensitizes the Or HaEmet students to children with challenges."

For more information on inclusion, parents or educators can call Lorne Miller at 416-226-1022.

Courses for retired people in many formats

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

With people living longer and retiring while in good health, a growing number of older adults are participating in a variety of activities, many designed to fill their specific needs.

In the field of education, new and innovative facilities have been created within existing higher educational institutions, as well as in synagogues, study groups, seniors' community centres and special interest clubs.

Courses offered cover a broad range of subjects. Some of them are led by instructors while others are peer-led; some are public workshops while others are private groups.

Aaron Hermant, 71, a practicing lawyer for 37 years, began taking courses eight years ago when he retired. His studies have varied from comparative religion to contemporary film and opera.

Along with taking courses at the Academy for Life Long Learning at Victoria College, Hermant has been facilitating courses in music appreciation there for six years.

"I believe that if you don't use your mind it turns to mush," he says. "When you retire, it is important to replace the mental stimulation of your work with other mental stimulation."

Hermant, a former president of the Academy, says he takes classes because they are stimulating.

The Academy for Life Long Learning presents more than 40 courses, all of which are workshop oriented.

"This format encourages participation and students are expected to research topics and present sessions."

Ralph Wintrob, 70, says he has always had a desire to learn. "When you stop learning, you die."

Formerly a teacher-librarian and library consultant with the North York Board of Education, Wintrob, who retired seven years ago, has taken a variety of courses at L.I.F.E. Institute at Ryerson Polytechnic University's continuing education division.

The motto at L.I.F.E. is "Learning is Forever." There are more than 20 peer-led and instructor-led courses as well as off-site and online courses. And there is a growing demand for computer classes.

The Centre presents a monthly speakers' forum, a weekly brown-bag lunch lecture series called The Philosophy Cafe, with professors from a variety of disciplines at Ryerson and several interest clubs such as the Investment Club.

Wintrob told The CJN that he takes classes because "I like to meet great new people and I like to keep busy. As well, it is a creative outlet for me."

Active as a volunteer in the community, Wintrob adds that the courses at Ryerson give him an opportunity to use skills he has honed over the decades. He serves as a peer course leader and is the former chair of the curriculum committee and a board member.

Potrait of a rabbi at study* by Willem van Nieuwenhoven.

"After decades of involvement in my professional responsibilities, my wife and I can now do those courses together and share common interests that we never had time for before."

Bookie Kwart, Co-ordinator of the Life Long Learning Institute at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a seniors community centre, notes that people participating at the Centre are more educated than in the past and are more knowledgeable and aware of the news through television and radio.

"Mental stimulation is as important as physical exercise is to one's well being," Kwart says.

At Betel, members can participate in numerous courses, lectures, book clubs and other educational programs.

"Many are interactive, not two-dimensional," Kwart says. "It is important that our members participate in a group rather than in a social vacuum.

"At the Centre, we promote learning in a non-threatening environment, providing structure, focus and stimulation to the day of the older adult."

Religious institutions also offer numerous courses in Judaic studies.

Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning was created 10 years ago. Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Kolel's founding director, told The CJN that there is a constant and steady interest in adult education, especially among those of retirement age. She says that people with more leisure time want to enrich their lives.

Educators on homework

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Listen to the buzz in the playground, when the kids are in school and mothers are lingering behind, chatting in small groups.

Chances are they're talking about school – the teachers, the curriculum – and more often than not they're discussing the homework.

Parents complain to each other when there is too little homework, but they're certainly not very happy when their children are overloaded with work.

So how does one achieve a happy balance?

Karen Oster, a child development psychologist, says determining how much homework is the right amount depends on many factors.

First, it is necessary to look at the age of the child, the other activities that the child is involved with and what the homework is about, Oster says.

"Is it about work they didn't complete during the day or [is it] an elaboration of the things they learned during the day?"

Oster recommends a half hour to 40 minutes of homework for children in Grade 4 and under.

Lucy Cohen, director of schools at United Synagogue Day Schools, said that it is difficult to measure the amount of homework with the length of time it takes to complete it.

The amount of homework is often not time related because "children have different time-management skills."

Cohen says the homework has to be interesting. "If children are not engaged or interested, then school becomes a drudgery."

She says drills are important. "Kids are not going to be engaged in drills," Cohen says. "It has to be problem-based."

Parents should participate by being a part of the homework. "They should not be doing the work. They should set the framework, ask questions, show interest. But definitely don't do the work."

Uri Korin, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School, says homework is viewed as an integral part of the learning process.

The purpose of homework is a review. "There's a need to be more at ease with a concept or a mathematical formula."

"In the early years – grades 1 and 2 – homework is basically a review, an oral review of reading. We assign very little time.

"The only exception is if a child does not finish something at school, it is important to finish it at home."

Parents should create an environment of learning with the home as an extension of school, a place where learning is encouraged and supported, Korin says. "It's a partnership."

The assignment of homework in Grade 3 should not be more than 15 minutes of work for a total of 30 minutes; in grades 4 and 5 homework should not exceed one hour for both Hebrew and English studies.

As the years progress, there's more homework, Korin says. "In grades 6, 7 and 8, homework is an integral part of their load.

"For grades 6 to 8, we expect an average of 15 minutes per day per subject. They see eight to nine teachers per day. We are talking on the average of two hours a day with the exception of major projects and test preparations."

While there are no assignments over winter and Pesach breaks or during the chagim, there is an expectation that children do homework on Sundays, Korin says.

"This year we are enforcing this policy and teachers and division co-ordinators are dealing with students who do not comply."

Korin says he gets involved if the problem persists, but so far he is pleased with the level of homework completion. "Out of 840 students, I wrote only two letters in the first semester."

Gail Baker, co-principal of the Toronto Heschel School, says parents should take the initiative to help their children get started with homework. "They need to help the child find a comfortable place to work and oversee the homework by checking the agenda and communications books."

Parents should be aware if there are problems and alert the school.

Homework reinforces what the children learn and gives parents an opportunity to see what the children are learning, Baker says.

"Homework reinforces the connection between home and school."

Because day school children have a double program with many subjects, they need to continue some of the work at home, she adds.

Homework also helps the children develop work-study habits.

At the Heschel School, homework starts in kindergarten with a borrow a book program. In the primary grades, children may get home work two to three times a week and by Grade 3 it's daily, Baker says.

The homework load continues to increase in the upper grades, and by middle school, children should have – give or take – about an hour of work a night, she says.

Given their learning style, not all children benefit from the same homework assignment, Baker says, and some children with learning problems need to do daily work to reinforce their skills.

Bialik adds Jewish traditions to curriculum

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A curriculum in tfillah, or prayer, is becoming part of the program at Bialik Hebrew Day School as one aspect of a broad-based change at the 840-student, non-denominational, Zionist school.

"We call it Traditional Practices," said Uri Korin, the school's director of education, in a recent interview, referring to the new curriculum encompassing daily, Shabbat and holiday prayer.

"It's much more than tfillah... it's an in-depth understanding of the services, the place of services in the Siddur, the geography of the Siddur, understanding the Jewish community and its components."

The program, which is being implemented this year and next, will include, among other aspects, the Jewish life cycle, kashrut and visits to synagogues of different denominations.

Does the change signal a new philosophical direction for the 40-year-old school? No, says Korin, who has run Bialik for 14 years.

"The philosophy allows for it. Jewish values and the love of Israel are part of our tradition... [The students] live in a Jewish community where the synagogue is an important place."

Prayer itself is not a radical innovation for Bialik. Students have been learning tfillah as long as Korin has been at the school. They also celebrate Shabbat and holidays in the classroom, but none of that has been formalized as part of the curriculum, he explained.

This year, prayer is being taught to students in grades 5 and 6, he said. "Hopefully synagogue visits will begin in Grade 7, at least to three or four synagogues so students experience as many Jewish denominations as possible."

Bialik's longtime challenge, according to Mark Skapinker, chairman of the board, has been how to teach tradition to a heterogeneous group of students.

"I think there's been an impetus, the parents requesting more and more ability for kids to feel comfortable in any Jewish environment. I think it's a natural progression."

Skapinker, a father of two Bialik students and one graduate, said he wants his children to feel comfortable in any synagogue. "That's an important part of their education. I don't think it's a trade-off."

The changes were announced in a strategic planning report published last June, the culmination of a reassessment process that began seven years ago. Participants represented parents, staff and Bialik board members.

"The sense of the need of students to be familiar and comfortable with traditional practices came out of recommendations of one of the committees," said Korin. Curriculum planning is being undertaken in conjunction with the Board of Jewish Education, he noted.

As part of the implementation, Bialik is seeking a principal of Jewish studies, a newly created position.

Until this school year, Jewish studies – which includes Hebrew language, Jewish and Israeli history, and Bible studies – fell into Korin's bailiwick as principal. As well, Yiddish, a legacy of the school's Labour Zionist origins, is introduced in Grade 3, Mishna in Grade 6 and Talmud in Grade 8.

Korin's vice-principal (Shana Harris, now General Studies principal) co-ordinated general studies for grades 1 to 5, among other duties. The rest of the administrative team included a preschool co-ordinator and co-ordinator of the school's senior division (grades 6, 7 and 8).

Now Korin is director of education, and there will be two principals responsible for Jewish studies and general studies, respectively, from junior kindergarten to Grade 8. In addition, there are co-ordinators for the school's preschool, elementary and senior divisions.

Some other aspects of the strategic planning include evaluation of academic standards, finding a site for a northern campus, and facilitating communication between school and parent.

The art of education

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

It has been Jewish tradition to teach the Torah through art since pre-talmudic time.

"The Midrash is the interpretation and enrichment of biblical text through a literary art form," says Rachael Turkienicz, the Judaic studies director of the Toronto Heschel School, who is also a professor at York University.

"So, rather than just teach midrash, what we have done at Heschel is pick up on the educational model of teaching Judaics through an art form.

"While the midrash took the art form that was familiar to the people of those times, we try to integrate Judaic studies into current art forms that children can relate to today," Turkienicz said.

"One of the grades at our school, for example, does a weaving of the Book of Genesis where colours and textures convey the emotions, causes and effects experienced by the people in Genesis.

"For the whole year, as the students progress through Genesis, they expand on their weavings, and each student will select the colours and textures that they feel reflect the various emotions experienced by the people they are learning about."

A Shabbat collage

Dance, drama, photography and music are also used at the school.

"At Heschel, the children first sharpen their textual skills and then use different art forms to enrich their understanding of the material.

"Of course, we have to be careful that the art forms always adhere to Jewish laws and guidelines," Turkienicz said. "For example, God is always expressed in the abstract and the children are taught why this is so."

While the arts are used as an integral part of the teaching and learning environment, said Judith Leitner, the integrated arts director at the school, the arts are also an excellent tool of assessment for the teachers as they watch their children engage in different forms of creative expression.

"There are so many parts of assessment – if teachers are watching and listening very carefully, they can learn so much about the child.

"What is essential to an arts-based education at our school, Leitner said, is that all the children have their textual knowledge intact."

Whether it's Chumash or Rashi, or math or language arts, the knowledge base is absolutely critical.

The arts may be used as an entry point, or they may be used as an expression of knowledge. But, it's important to note, Leitner said, "that we're not an arts school. At Heschel, the process is infinitely more important than the product."

"Arts education is, by its very nature, whole brained. It's hands-on and it's multi-sensory," said Gail Baker, the co-principal at Heschel.

And this fits right into the theory of multiple intelligences, which is one of the educational bases at the Toronto Heschel School, Baker said.

"The theory of multiple intelligences is one of the tools used at the school in order build a school of excellence and pursue the goal of teaching for understanding."

Using the theories of multiple intelligences, "the arts can be used to help the children pursue complex and diversified learning," she said.

"The arts also access many different parts of the brain; this gives the children more opportunities for retrieval of information.

"And there is a naturalness to the arts for children. The children don't have inhibitions."

Most importantly, they just simply enjoy this kind of work. And that makes it a great way to transmit Jewish culture and ensure our future, Baker said.

Baruch Rand, the principal of the school, said the arts give the children opportunities to use all their senses in an enjoyable atmosphere.

The philosophy of the school is based on creating an atmosphere where children feel comfortable and can express themselves in a positive environment.

"We also feel that it is important here to teach art for art's sake," Rand said.

"Human beings aren't fully developed until they learn to appreciate and understand art. It shouldn't be an optional part of human development."

Out of Spain and into the classroom

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Some say that Jewish merchants began arriving in Spain aboard Phoenician trading ships.

Other legends claim the original Jewish settlers were sent to Spain by King Solomon to develop overseas trade.

Whatever the case, Sephardi Jewry today has emerged as a large and important segment of the Jewish people and it is important that their history be taught, says Andrée Aelion Brooks, project director of a new curriculum titled Out of Spain.

The curriculum, designed for 10 to 12-year-olds, which has recently become available for use in Jewish congregational and day schools, is a study program that deals with Sephardi history and culture.

"This is a program which deals with ethnic history, the story of a people," Brooks, who is an Associate Fellow at Yale University, said in a phone interview. "It is not a history of rites and rituals. It is about daily life.

"Of course, the roles of the rabbis and the scholars are important," she said, "but this is not meant to be a religious teaching text. The program is meant to focus on the people – how they lived and how they felt."

Brooks, who comes from a Sephardi background, said that after she attended several conferences, it became apparent that there was a real need for a Sephardi history program.

"But the program is not written especially for Sephardi Jewry.

"In fact, most of my orders are from mainstream congregational schools," she said.

There are four books in the series covering the history of the Jews of Spain before their expulsion in 1492, the scattering of Sephardi Jews, and Sephardi customs, music, languages, festivals and food.

The resource guide notes that the "objective of this series is to help augment pride and excitement in a rich area of Jewish history, heritage and cultural identity that is too often overlooked."

Brooks designed the series, for use in grades 5 to 7, with Yvonne Behar, a teacher and curriculum specialist, and Prof. Jane Gerber, the director of the Institute for Sephardic Studies at City University of New York.

Musical instruments used in 14th-century Spain [Illustration from Out of Spain curriculum]

"We decided to focus on this particular age group after consultations with school education directors who noted that this is when Jewish schools begin teaching about Jews in the Diaspora," Brooks said.

The books include pictures, games, dramatizations, songs and puzzles. References to Internet sites are suggested to augment many of the lessons, and a teacher's guide describes additional ways to get students involved.

There is an audiotape available, as well as a 12-minute video, starring Theodore Bikel, whose ancestors came from Constantinople.

"Given the changing nature of children today and the fact that many have short attention spans, it was important to put together an interactive and relevant program," Brooks said.

Brooks, who is the author of a book titled Children of Fast Track Parents, said that "children today learn much more visually.

"So many kids have grown up on TV and have gotten used to visual and short sound bites.

"It is important that children can take their real world and superimpose it onto historical material, which may seem somewhat remote to them."

In one section of Out of Spain, the expulsion from Spain is used as a basis for a TV news broadcast.

"The children see their parents watch the news every night when they go home," Brooks said. "By recreating a news program, the children learn what it must have been like to be a Jew in Spain at that time, as well as understand the changing nature of Europe as the Christians regained control."

In another section, meant to be dramatized by the children, the frustrations and shame felt by Sephardi immigrants is described, followed by the desire and pride of later generations to explore their differences.

"We tried to put together a program that is informative, relevant and fun," Brooks said. "It's not obscure or boring."

After 21 years of providing quality education to students in Junior Kindergarten through Grade 8,

The ad clearly caused divisions, says Ronen

Ronen said discussions within the Jewish community prior to adoption of the final draft of the petition were extensive, resulting in modification of the document's language. But the key differences were not resolved.

"The ad clearly caused divisions," he said.

After consulting with Congress officers, Ronen concluded that "we have a clear policy [indicating] that on matters of peace and security, we leave those questions to the government and people of Israel to decide."

The future of the Old City of Jerusalem and of the Temple Mount, Judaism's holiest site, have been subject to negotiations, with reports suggesting that the Israeli government might give up sovereignty in exchange for Palestinian concessions on refugees.

Wilder said he declined to sign the document because "as chair of CIC, I'm very closely associated with that organization and I didn't want it to appear that my organization was signing on to it."

The CIC's constituent members (Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the CZF and 10 federated communities plus Atlantic Canada) had not voted to back the agreement, Wilder said.

Rob Ritter, national executive director of the CIC said, "The principle of supporting [Israel's] government of the day is one we hold to be important."

Derek Penslar, the Samuel Zacks professor of Jewish history at the University of Toronto, said the divisions sparked by Israeli politics is something the U.S. Jewish community has been contending with since the 1982 Lebanon War.

In contrast, the Canadian Jewish community has historically been more supportive of Israel and more politically conservative than in the United States. In recent years, the Toronto community has become more divided on a number of issues and "Israel is a maelstrom for competitive tensions."

"Jerusalem is a symptom of a much larger and deeper problem, of a rift within each Jewish community," Penslar contended.

In related developments, leading U.S. Orthodox groups held a rally of solidarity in a Manhattan synagogue coinciding with massive demonstrations in Israel against relinquishing sovereignty over Jerusalem, JTA reported.

The simultaneous events came amid renewed debate over whether some American Jewish leaders are breaching long-held principles of not opposing the democratically elected government of Israel or interfering in Israeli elections.

Ronald Lauder, chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, spoke briefly at a rally in Jerusalem's Old City that was widely perceived as being anti-Barak. Lauder said he was speaking as an individual, not as the Conference of Presidents chair.

Yet some suggested Lauder would not have been invited to address the crowd if he were simply a cosmetics magnate who happens to be a Jew.

The most outspoken of Lauder's U.S. critics, Rabbi Ammiel Hirsch, executive director of the Reform Movement's ARZA World Union, went on an Israel radio program to "apologize" to the Israeli public if Lauder "gave the impression that he was representing American Jews."

Rabbi Hirsch, whose group is a Conference of Presidents member, told JTA "the conference itself did not give its authorization for Mr. Lauder to participate in the rally, let alone to speak. In fact, it specifically feared that his speaking would be perceived as interfering directly in Israeli politics, which all agreed the conference has never done before."

With files from JTA.

Life and learning amid realities of the intifadah

By MARISSA MILLER
JUF News

JERUSALEM — Shrick of the alarm clock to start a new day.

Soak up incredible view from apartment in Jerusalem. Nibble on pita and hummus on way to class. Whine after confirming term paper really is due tomorrow. Book gym before all treadmills are occupied. Run through mounting pile of Hebrew vocabulary flashcards. Convince roommate to come hear tonight's speaker at Hillel with you. Plead with Israeli friend to speak to you in Hebrew, not English.

Just a typical day in the life of a North American student at Hebrew University.

On a particular morning, I study physics at the university's Givat Ram campus. My professor demonstrates in class how to calculate the distance a missile fired at initial velocity X can travel. The practical application of this "hypothetical" problem takes on new meaning this semester with the intifadah currently going on in Israel. Little did I know when I boarded my El Al flight on Aug. 7 that the Chinese curse, "May you live in interesting times," would soon befall me.

Over these past four months, I've learned the therapeutic benefits of laughter. One night I was on Ben Yehuda Street and got into a cab to take me home to my apartment on Mt. Scopus. I asked the driver in Hebrew how much the trip would cost. He answered, "Fifteen shekels. But it's 10 shekels extra for each stone that is thrown at my cab on the way."

Last weekend, my friends and I had planned to go to Tel Aviv. Out of habit, we checked the Internet right before departing for the bus to get the most breaking news, only to discover a bomb had just been detonated at the Tel Aviv bus station. We modified our plans slightly.

But there are days when it is a lot harder to find a reason to laugh. The afternoon of the fated Mahane Yehuda car bombing (Nov. 2), my roommate had decided she was sick of living under restrictions and ventured to that very area to do some shopping.

Meanwhile, I obliviously sat through my history of Zionism lecture. Upon hearing the news after class, my heart sank to my stomach. The panic intensified as I discovered cell phone signals were not operating, as a result of everyone simultaneously attempting to call and reassure their loved ones. It was the longest 15 minutes of my life before my cell phone rang and my roommate's humbled voice came through on the other end of the line.

Such are the realities of the intifadah. But I am a foreign student. I am living in an apartment building with IDF reservist soldiers who have served their time and are now in university. I have it easy. I go home in January.

This, however, is their home. They constantly check their voice mail to see if they have been called back to service. They have sacrificed the best years of their young adult lives to fight, to allow people like me to be here.

The only difference between Israelis and me is that their ancestors settled in Israel while my ancestors happened to have settled in America. When worried friends and family ask me why I stay in Israel under the current situation, I answer that when living side by side with the people who have fought and will continue to fight for this country – the people whose best friends are on CNN and the American nightly news – I wouldn't dare run away.

That said, the situation most days is one of normalcy. The vast majority of the overseas students in the Rothberg International School of Hebrew University have made the decision to remain in Israel – a decision, in most cases, highly supported by our parents. We go about our daily business in Jerusalem and travel on the weekends to the safe parts of Israel. I forget that there is an intifadah most of the time, especially when I am around Israelis who display more concern about last night's soccer game between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem than anything else!

Israelis cringe when they hear that the economy continues to suffer as tourism declines. But after living here, I feel confident saying the biggest risk I have encountered is crossing the street in the morning to get to school. (Israeli drivers make New York City drivers look cautious behind the wheel, but don't tell my mother.) I fear that by choosing not to come to Israel right now, Diaspora Jews are letting the terrorists win. They want us to live in fear. Now, more then ever, we must come to Israel to prove our commitment, strength and unity.

Marissa Miller, who is from the Chicago area, is spending a semester at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem on a study abroad program through her school, Duke University.

Coast to Coast

Bouchard's principles lauded

"It is harmful to Quebec's reputation abroad…," he said. "Without the National Assembly resolution, the damage would have been greater."

Without mentioning Michaud's name, Bouchard defended the National Assembly's unanimous support of a resolution denouncing Michaud's remarks about Jews and ethnic communities. The day before Bouchard resigned, a full-page advertisement condemning the resolution as an attack on free speech – the second in a month – was placed in Le Devoir by the Committee for Solidarity with Michaud and containing the names of dozens of PQ rank and file members.

Bouchard said the legislature acted "legitimately," because Michaud was not just a private individual, but "a person who was trying to join us."

Attacking people for their rejection of sovereignty is no way to win them over, Bouchard indicated. "Imagine their outrage; some communities are open to [sovereignty], some have even joined us."

He also rejected reported negotiations with Michaud involving Deputy Premier Bernard Landry, encouraging Michaud to abandon his bid to run in a byelection in Mercier riding, in exchange for the National Assembly rescinding the resolution.

"There is not room for bargaining," Bouchard said. (Michaud has not filed nomination papers.)

"This was the most articulate and passionate defence of the Jewish community I have ever heard from a Quebec leader, PQ or Liberal," said BBC Quebec director Robert Libman.

Canadian Jewish Congress called Bouchard's announcement "dramatic and dignified."

"Premier Bouchard's moving and unequivocal commitment to tolerance and inclusion is a powerful affirmation of essential values that all Quebecers can take pride in sharing," said its Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard.

"He reiterated that the equality of all Quebecers is a fundamental right, and that's a message which future leaders would do well to honour."

Libman said he finds himself, like many Jews and federalists, in a "paradox. On the one hand, the only person, in my opinion, who can achieve sovereignty is gone and I'm glad. If this had happened more than a month ago, I would have said good riddance. On the other, here is a man who has spoken so sincerely and sensitively about the Jewish community, going far beyond what anyone would have expected, so you have mixed feelings."

In its official statement, BBC "lamented" the premier's departure and regretted that Michaud and his hard-line supporters "pushed the premier over the edge."

"In the eyes of the Quebec Jewish community, [Bouchard] had his finest moment in his handling of the Michaud affair. Michaud and his followers should go into hiding today, for they have dealt a severe blow to their own party," said BBC legal counsel Steve Slimovitch.

Canada-Israel Committee Quebec chair Thomas Hecht was unreserved in his appreciation of Bouchard. "I think we can be proud of this man… There are very few politicians who have ever expressed such deep feeling for what it means to be a Jew."

Although the Michaud affair may not have been the critical factor in his decision to go, Hecht has no doubt Bouchard is genuine in what he said. "He is a highly principled individual, a true believer in democratic values."

Hecht thinks the positive side of the Michaud affair is that it shows "Quebec has changed significantly. It is a much more open society… The old ethnocentric chauvinism is no longer mainstream or forms the consensus."

D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman, who spearheaded the resolution condemning Michaud, thinks the Yom Hashoah resolution, which he also was responsible for a year ago, has created a new awareness of the Holocaust among Quebecers.

The National Assembly had a "moral duty" to censure Michaud, Bergman said, and Bouchard recognized the necessity of that.

Academic Jack Jedwab, a former CJC Quebec director, thinks federalists should not celebrate right away.

"Bouchard's resignation could be interpreted as Michaud winning this showdown. His supporters may be able to present what's going on as a case of French-Canadians versus the others."

The drama the province has now been thrown into might have been avoided if the National Assembly had not been presented with the anti-Michaud resolution and Bouchard had said from right at the beginning: "I'm not going to sign the papers of this anti-Semite," Jedwab said.

"It was not necessary for the National Assembly to go that route, or for Bouchard to say it's up to the party's executive committee. It simply relieved Bouchard of the responsibility of dealing with Michaud head-on."

Montreal museum joins hunt for Nazi-looted art

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After initial reluctance, the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts (MMFA) has agreed to check into the ownership history of European art works in its permanent collection dating from the Nazi period.

The MMFA says it will verify the provenance of approximately 350 paintings and sculptures created before 1945 and acquired by the MMFA since 1933, joining the effort underway at other museums in Canada and worldwide to uncover art looted from Jews during World War II.

A list of works whose "histories contain gaps" will be posted on the Internet this spring. The National Gallery in Ottawa and Toronto's Art Gallery of Ontario have already published such lists on their Web sites.

"I don't think there was ever an unwillingness. It was a situation where we had to prioritize," said MMFA spokesperson Wanda Palm. The MMFA does not have the same resources as other museums that responded with more alacrity, she added.

Contrary to some newspaper reports, the MMFA says it never owned a painting by 17th-century French artist Nicolas Poussin entitled Venus and Aeneas, which Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) claims has been traced to a collection acquired by art dealers working for Adolf Hitler and Hermann Goering, which was owned by Dutch Jew and art dealer Jacques Goudstikker, who fled Holland in 1940.

CJC is concerned about an MMFA holding, Entrée de la propriété du Général d'Oisel by Pierre-Auguste Renoir, which it says may have been acquired unscrupulously by one of Hitler's art dealers in France. CJC says the painting came to the MMFA from "a suspect source."

The MMFA announcement came after CJC, Quebec region, publicly urged museum officials to reconsider their earlier refusal to investigate their collection for works that may have been looted by the Nazis from Jewish owners.

"Any refusal to investigate, given the mounting evidence and positions taken by other distinguished museums, would be most inappropriate and completely unacceptable," said CJC Quebec region president Dorothy Zalcman Howard.

"Museums exist to showcase and preserve lasting expressions of humanity," added Victor Goldbloom, chair of the CJC Quebec region executive committee.

"Our fine museum in Montreal can only honour that mission by ensuring that none of its works were, in fact, linked to the very worst acts of inhumanity in the last century."

In December, the National Post reported that the MMFA had acquired Venus and Aeneas in 1953 and the Renoir painting in 1951. The newspaper did not identify the source of its information. It quoted an unnamed museum spokesperson as refusing to comment, saying the history of ownership of art owned by a public institution is "confidential information."

The MMFA has not denied holding Renoir's Entrée de la Propriété du Général d'Oisel.

The Post reported that this painting was once part of the collection of Parisian Ambroise Vollard, which fell into the hands of French dealer Martin Fabiani upon Vollard's death in 1939. Although this work was not looted for the Nazis, Fabiani was arrested and fined for his dealings in art plundered from Nazi victims, and was one of the Paris dealers who supplied looted art to Hitler, according to the Post.

In defending its record, the MMFA pointed out last week that it was the first Canadian museum to return to its previous owner a work of art believed to have been looted during the war. In 1999, the MMFA gave back the painting The Marriage Feast at Cana by 16th-century Italian artist Giorgio Vasari, which it had owned since 1964, to the Museum of Fine Arts in Budapest.

"As a sign of gratitude, the Hungarian museum is lending Montreal a number of major works from its collection. They will be on display at the MMFA in 2002, in an exhibition titled Raphael to Tiepolo: Italian Masterpieces from the Collection of the Budapest Museum of Fine Arts," said Palma.

CJC and the Canadian Museums Association jointly stated last week that they will work together to help locate and return Nazi-confiscated art to the rightful owners. This spring, the two organizations plan to hold a national planning meeting with representatives of the country's museums and the federal government. They are thinking of creating a central "clearing house" on the Internet to co-ordinate information and ensure public access to suspect works, and of seeking Ottawa's assistance in undertaking the extensive research that may be needed.

The 'word' around the Hill

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

The Prime Minister may be celebrating his 67th birthday in sunnier climes in Florida, but the mood in the nation's capital is pretty overcast. In many respects, it all has to do with words.

Word of Lucien Bouchard's surprise decision to step down as Premier of Quebec and leader of the separatist forces has shocked many in town. His departure is in large part attributed to the words of fellow separatist, Yves Michaud. Michaud's remarks and the Parti Quebecois Executive Committee's unending drive to toughen up the language laws (itself an issue of words and their import) have caused Bouchard to grow weary of the fight.

But as he segues off to a cozy sinecure, Bouchard leaves Stephan Dion et al wondering what comes next. Will the PQ choose a more strident leader to advance the cause of separation? Or, as some are suggesting, has the struggle to end the mirage of Quebec's "humiliation" really evaporated?

While the Plan B authors mull over the implications of St. Lucien's resignation, other Liberals are trying to find upbeat words to calm the pro-Martin troops. The mood in those ranks is as bleak as the Ottawa horizon since all the signals point to Chrétien sticking around for the foreseeable future. Word has it that the modest cabinet announcement that elevated none of the so-called stars who ran for the Liberals to ministerial status, represents a stark message from the Boss: Toe the line and you'll get your shot, eventually. Join the ranks of the Martin/Rock agitators and make yourselves comfortable on the backbenches. Pretty grim tidings for ministerial wannabees.

Words were also quietly exchanged in the alleys of the Canadian Alliance. There is growing concern that the fledgling party may have made a serious blunder in selecting Stockwell Day as its leader. His choice of words (there's that word thing again) during the campaign, it is argued, revealed an easily distracted and unfocused dimension to the otherwise photogenic standard-bearer. People are anxious; they don't know what they are supposed to do next.

In all three cases, the common "word" that describes the mood is uncertainty... even distressing uncertainty. This is not an encouraging way to greet the new Parliament – which opens in just two weeks. Add in the most dreaded word of all that is making the rounds, "recession," and you have a recipe for parliamentary despair. About the only excitement around, just now, relates to the contest for new Speaker of the House of Commons.

No 'irreversible steps' included in Barak's unilateral separation plan

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — According to a unilateral separation plan prepared under the guidance of Prime Minister Ehud Barak, Israel will set up a line of defence around the settlement blocs in the West Bank that are intended for annexation to Israel under a permanent peace agreement.

Israel will also keep control of isolated settlements and of a wide security zone in the Jordan Valley, to be used as bargaining chips until a peace agreement is achieved.

Barak indicated that the separation plan would go into effect only in the event of one of three scenarios: as a response to a unilateral declaration of statehood on the part of the Palestinians; under a severe security threat; or as part of an agreement with the Palestinian Authority.

Barak has also decided to refrain from taking irreversible steps that might prejudice the chances of achieving an agreement in the future. The recent actions of the Israel Defence Forces in the West Bank, such as the moving of the Green Line barriers eastward and the cutting off of Palestinian villages from the trans-Samaria road, were taken to protect the settlements and not as part of a decision to implement a separation.

According to a senior diplomatic source, the security measures "are not alienated from the general considerations of the Camp David understandings, but they are not meant to show that Israel is following any line other than an attempt to reach an agreement."

The objective of the plan is to preserve the Jewish identity of Israel by means of a demographic separation from the Palestinians. The formulators of the plan propose focusing on Israel's vital interests and refraining from unnecessarily expanding the settlement blocs.

When the plan was presented to the political security cabinet a few weeks ago, the ministers were told that "the more violent and critical the scenario is, the less flexible Israel will be on the various parameters. The security zone in the Jordan Valley will be wider and the settlement blocs more complete."

There is no agreed-upon map for the separation, the diplomatic source said, and in talks with the Palestinians, Israel made sure to present various alternatives. The IDF prefers to strengthen its security hold and expand the "narrow waist" of Israel in western Samaria. Other organizations have suggested leaving more settlements under Israeli control.

The settlement blocs included in the separation plan are around Jerusalem (Ma'aleh Adumim, the Etzion bloc and Givat Ze'ev), the Ariel-Karnei Shomron bloc, the Kiryat Sefer bloc adjacent to Modi'in and settlements along the Green Line such as Alfei Menasheh, Har Adar, Beit Horon and others.

In order to avoid taking irreversible steps, the plan proposes not to erect electronic fences around the settlement blocs, but rather to protect them by means of mobile military forces and obstacles such as concrete blocks and ditches, which provide a line of defence but can be removed in the event of an agreement. "There is no point in investing billions for nothing," the source said.

The separation plan also includes a detailed legal and administrative infrastructure for joining the settlement blocs to Israel, as preparation for a possible annexation in the future. The plan determines how infrastructure currently shared by the settlements and the Palestinian Authority will be redeployed, how the settlements will be made part of various municipal authorities and which schools the children will attend.

The plan also deals with the paving of "separation roads" that do not pass through Palestinian villages. The old roads, which Israelis no longer use and are no longer patrolled by the IDF, are gradually being transferred to Palestinian control, even without an agreement.

Israel is aiming to annex as few Palestinians as possible, but in the event of a crisis, will have to deal with Palestinian villages that remain within the settlement blocs. Villages in the Etzion Bloc, for example, will be able to maintain their link with the municipal areas of Bethlehem and Beit Jala even after the separation.

The plan was originally formulated as the foundation for a permanent settlement with the Palestinians, based on a political, demographic and economic separation. After the failure of the Camp David summit, however, Barak also ordered that preparation be made for a unilateral separation in response to a possible Palestinian declaration of independence. The underlying instruction was that the conflict would be solved only through diplomatic means and therefore, the plan should not block the path to the negotiating table in the future.

According to the diplomatic source, the Barak government has not formulated a plan to evacuate isolated settlements in the framework of a unilateral separation or an agreement with the Palestinians. "There is no list of settlements intended for evacuation," the source said, adding that various models regarding the future of the settlements had been discussed.

"No one dealt with a plan for physical evacuation and no one will take a chance on dealing with it. We dealt only with blocs that will be annexed to Israel."

Israeli kidnapped, killed in Gaza

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Israeli resident of the Gush Katif settlements in the Gaza Strip, Roni Tzalach, who was in his early 30s, was kidnapped by Palestinians and murdered last weekend.

On Sunday evening, Tzalach's brother-in-law searched for him at the greenhouses where he was supposed to be working, because he failed to answer his cellular phone. His vehicle was also missing. A large scale search ensued, with Israel Defence Forces making extensive use of helicopters. The IDF has also closed down all roads leading to Gush Katif and all the crossings into Gaza.

Tzalach's vehicle was later located near Khan Yunis, through the use of a transponder which had been installed in the car. The car had been set ablaze.

Initial investigation of the greenhouses suggest that Tzalach did not leave the area of his own accord. It is suspected that Palestinian farm workers in the area may have abducted him.

The IDF contacted Palestinian security officials and informed them of the situation and asked them to assist in locating the man. By midnight, no progress had been reported in the search for Tzalach.

The head of the regional council of Gaza settlements, Aharon Tzur, claimed that "Palestinian security forces are involved in the kidnapping."

He called on Prime Minister Ehud Barak to act immediately "and not to repeat the mistakes of Har Eval and Joseph's Tomb." In both of those incidents, when Israelis were under attack, the IDF chose not to send large forces into Palestinian-held areas, for fear of incurring casualties and causing Palestinian civilian casualties.

Tzalach was married and had one child. He had farmed in the Gaza Strip for the past 10 years and was a resident of Kfar Yam.

Human rights groups condemn summary executions

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli human rights groups harshly condemned the executions carried out by the Palestinian Authority (PA) Sunday, at the same time calling on Israel to halt its policy of targeting Palestinians for "liquidation."

The Public Committee Against Torture demanded that PA Chairman Yasser Arafat immediately close down the national security court following the execution yesterday of Alan Bani Odeh and Majdi Machawi for collaboration with Israel.

In a letter sent to Arafat and PA Justice Minister Freih Abu Medayin, the committee condemned the executions, conducted after a hasty trial, claiming that the court violated international law, the basic principles of equality before the law, the right to a fair trial and the right of the defendant to appeal the verdict.

The Association for Civil Rights in Israel yesterday told Prime Minister Ehud Barak that Israel must meet the same moral standards that it demands of the PA and order that the IDF's liquidation policy be halted.

On Sunday, Barak published a condemnation of the executions of the Palestinians suspected of collaborating with Israel.

"It is unfortunate that the Palestinian Authority, which seeks to become a recognized entity, uses show trials reminiscent of darker periods in history," Barak said.

Barak told the cabinet that he did not believe the condemned men were guilty and rejected the comparison made between the executions and the "elimination" of Tanzim and Fatah activists carried out by the IDF.

Despite the media blackout on the views of those who opposed the executions, Palestinian officials debated the topic on the Palestinian airwaves Sunday. The Palestinian Center for Human Rights in Gaza and other Palestinian human rights groups stated that those suspected of collaboration with Israel should be tried, but reiterated their objection to the death sentence, demanding that the national security court, which does not make a fair trial possible for defendants, be shut down.

Iran vows to support Syria, Lebanon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM – Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri ended an official visit to Tehran Sunday, where he met with Iranian leaders.

Hariri discussed with the Iranian leadership the possibility that Lebanon may receive assistance in a variety of fields, particularly in helping with the reconstruction of southern Lebanon.

The Beirut daily Al Mustaqbal, which Hariri owns, reported Sunday that Iran's spiritual leader, Ali Khamenei, said Iran constitutes the "strategic depth" for Syria and Lebanon.

Senior Iranian officials have said repeatedly in recent weeks that if Israel attacks Syria and Lebanon, Iran will come to their defense. Iran's defense minister, Ali Shamkhani, said last month that Iran's response to an Israeli attack on Syria or Lebanon will be "surprising and stunning."

According to the Lebanese daily, Khamenei told Hariri that Iran supports Hezbollah's continued activities against Israel, "despite Israel's withdrawal from a significant part of the south.

Cairo trial opens of Egyptian suspected of spying for Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — An Egyptian, Sharif al Filali, 34, pleaded not guilty to spying for Israel at the opening session of a trial in Egypt last weekend.

Nevertheless, the state prosecutors asked the court to convict the defendant and sentence him to the maximum penalty of life imprisonment.

The prosecution said Filali had gathered military and economic information for Israel's Mossad intelligence agency along with a Russian, identified as Grigory Jevins, who is being tried in absentia.

Filali, who was arrested two months ago after 17 days of interrogation, is being tried at the High Court for State Security. Since his arrest, Israel has officially denied any connection with the defendant.

Defence attorney Ahmed Said Abdel-Halek, a family friend of Filali's, volunteered to defend the suspect even though religious courts issued a ruling which forbade any Egyptian lawyer from doing so because of his alleged links with Israel.

The defence argues that Filali voluntarily returned to Egypt from Spain, where he had dealings with the Russian suspect, an arms trader with whom he recently worked. Abdel-Halek says that his client had gone to the Egyptian embassy in Madrid last June, and reported that he had suspicions about the activities of Jevins.

Filali's mother, Soheir Murad, said, "I have faith that my son is innocent and I know he could not betray Egypt."

The court set the next session for Feb. 11.

"In any case, I don't recommend that anyone do what I did. If I had known in advance that it was a bomb, I would never have touched it. But because I had already opened the knapsack, and I saw the cell phone connected to the bomb, I understood that these were critical moments, in which I could save lives."

But if the police had mixed reactions, Bik's wife, Leah, was unequivocal. "I think he's crazy," she said.

Maj.-Gen. Micky Levy, the commander of the Jerusalem Police, said afterward that only bomb specialists are allowed to touch a bomb, and anyone who sees a suspicious object should immediately call the police. That yesterday's incident ended with no loss of life, he said, was a "miracle."

A leading haredi activist, Yehuda Meshi-Zahav, said that haredi rabbis had also warned their followers not to try to imitate Bik's actions.

"In our opinion, what he did was not heroic, but stupid," Meshi-Zahav said. "In such cases, you should immediately call the police."

Police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said that explosive materials and charges were also found earlier in the day in an area near Mea Shearim. In this case, however, the charges were not connected to the explosives, he said.

Worthwhile advice from Jordan

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

In President Clinton's bridging proposal for a fundamental agreement between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, there is a big question mark surrounding one of Israel's neighbours, Jordan.

What kind of future does the United States foresee for the Hashemite Kingdom and its prospects for coexistence with a Palestinian state? What has awakened this question is the debate over the fate of the Jordan Valley: who would control it and what its relations between Jordan and a would-be Palestine would look like.

In his bridging proposal, Clinton states that Israel must withdraw from the Jordan Valley within 36 months. In that time, an IDF force will remain there, under the aegis of an international force stationed in the region. Clinton adds that if security improves, Israel will be able to pull back more quickly. Nothing is said about what will happen if the situation deteriorates.

If intelligence reports from Amman are correct, the Jordanians are very concerned about Clinton's idea of transferring the Jordan Valley to the Palestinians and moving the IDF out as soon as possible. This will open a broad border between Jordan and the emerging Palestinian state, thereby exposing Jordan to political and demographic pressure, as well as subversive activity.

It is doubtful that the Americans have paid sufficient heed to the implications of such a move. Perhaps the Clinton administration is not convinced that Hashemite Jordan will be around in the long run.

Nevertheless, it is important that Israel bring up the issue of Jordan as soon as possible in meetings with the advisers of U.S. President-elect George Bush. These advisers give the impression of being quite open-minded on the subject of Jordan. The fact is, Israel has had a special interest in Jordan's survival for a long time, and King Abdullah knows it, too.

Before the death of King Hussein, I had two opportunities to discuss the Jordan Valley with top Jordanian officials. In terms of Jordan's strategic interests, I asked, was it better for the Jordan Valley to be in Israeli or Palestinian hands?

My interlocutors were not anxious to reply, even though we were speaking off the record. I came back to the question repeatedly until I finally received an answer: Israel, they replied, but only on condition that it did not annex the Jordan Valley, because this was a move Jordan would have to oppose.

Another condition for the Jordan Valley being in Israeli hands, they said, was that Israel make no claims about holding onto the Jordan Valley in order to protect the Hashemite kingdom. Amman would object to any such idea, as King Hussein did when he heard that Ariel Sharon had used such an argument in conversation with Sandy Berger, Clinton's national security adviser.

The senior Jordanian official to whom I spoke also offered an important piece of advice: Israel must not commit itself to a specific date for withdrawal from the Jordan Valley. Instead, it must insist on withdrawal only when the security situation allows for it. Israel is prepared to discuss security arrangements with both the Palestinians and Jordan.

When Justice Minister Yossi Beilin approached Shimon Peres in 1995 with the details of what is now known as the Beilin-Abu Mazen plan, Peres refused to support it for two reasons. The first reason was that it did not offer a practical solution for the problem of Jerusalem. The other was that it called for automatic Israeli withdrawal from the Jordan Valley after a period of 12 years.

Today, the Palestinian leadership officially rejects the Beilin-Abu Mazen plan, although both sides as well as the U.S. government have adopted many of its principles. In the same way that the Palestinians are demanding changes in the Clinton bridging proposal, Israel should be demanding changes in the clauses having to do with the Jordan Valley.

Iran trains glider guerrilla raiders

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran is training Palestinian fighters opposed to the peace process to launch glider raids to attack Israeli targets from Lebanon, Iranian television reported recently.

Men from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine – General Command (PFLP-GC), headed by Ahmed Jibril, were seen on television with Iranian instructors. The Iranian anchor said while Israel is well-prepared against attacks by land, it could be surprised by an attack from the air.

The general region of Har Dov, a focal point for opposition groups, including Hezbollah, was also mentioned in the report as a possible point of attack.

The PFLP-GC carried out a glider raid against a military base near Kiryat Shmona in November 1987 in which six Israeli soldiers and the Palestinian guerrilla were killed. In response to the threat of airborne attack from Lebanon, anti-aircraft defenses have been strengthened, mostly in the Har Dov area. Rules of engagement for IDF forces along the northern border have been eased to combat any aerial attack.

There is also concern such a raid could be co-ordinated with some form of ground attack in complicity with the Hezbollah, which controls the area across from Har Dov.

Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz told members of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee last week that the IDF has information that Hezbollah plans attacks along the northern border in the near future.

Police warn authorities of extremist danger

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — With peace negotiators discussing Israeli concessions on Jerusalem's Temple Mount in the midst of continuing Palestinian violence, Israeli security officials are keeping a wary eye on Jewish extremists.

The officials warn that Israel's far right could engage in vigilante retaliation for Palestinian violence, which has resulted in almost daily attacks on Israelis in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and the ambush slaying of a prominent right-wing extremist on Dec. 31.

In a worst-case scenario, officials warn, an attack against Muslim holy sites on the Temple Mount could spark an Islamic crusade drawing legions of faithful from as far as Indonesia, setting in motion a veritable Armageddon.

"This could threaten the very existence of Israel," said Assaf Hefetz, the former inspector-general of Israel's police.

Hefetz, along with Carmi Gillon, a former head of the Shin Bet domestic security service, sent a letter to Prime Minister Ehud Barak recently warning of the threat extremist Jewish groups may pose to the Temple Mount – and, by extension, to Israel's security.

These groups cannot be dismissed as marginal, said Hefetz, who estimated that their numbers have "doubled and even tripled" since Palestinian violence against Israel erupted more than three months ago.

Yizhar Be'er, director general of the Keshev Center for the Protection of Democracy in Israel, which specializes in monitoring extremist groups, estimated that their membership has grown by leaps and bounds in the past decade.

Rabbi Michael Melchior, Israel's minister for Israeli society and world Jewish communities, said last week that the extremist threat to the Temple Mount must be taken seriously.

"There is nothing more sensitive than the Temple Mount," he said. "It can be the gate to heaven, but it can also be the gate to hell."

Rabbi Melchior offered the comment after the Keshev Center sent Barak a detailed report recently on the activities of far-right groups.

The warnings surfaced after Israel's Chief Rabbinical Council – which includes the two chief rabbis and the rabbis of Israel's major cities – issued a ruling recently prohibiting Israeli officials from ceding sovereignty over the Temple Mount to the Palestinians.

Sovereignty over the Temple Mount "belongs to the people of Israel, so even discussing it would be a desecration of God's name," the council ruled.

The council was reacting to reports that Barak supports a U.S. peace plan under which Israel would cede the Temple Mount to Palestinian control.

The government is not bound by the council's ruling, but Barak nevertheless assured the council that he would not allow the Palestinians to control the Temple Mount. He did not rule out placing it under the control of some third party, however.

Ehud Sprinzak, a political scientist at the Inter-Disciplinary Center in Herzliyah and an expert on the radical right, said the prospects of a Jewish attack on the Mount are slim.

While many Israelis are mobilizing against giving up the Temple Mount – Monday's 300,000-strong demonstration against Israeli concessions in Jerusalem is just one example – few people support vigilante action, Sprinzak said.

"Prospects that such action will be taken at this time are small, since everyone who deals with the issue understands that the chance for an agreement on the Temple Mount is very slim," Sprinzak said.

Still, Israeli officials worry that Jewish extremists could use the Rabbinical Council ruling to justify almost any act.

Israel's radical right has been galvanized by the uncompromising stand Palestinian officials and clerics have taken regarding Arab rights to the Temple Mount.

Palestinian officials routinely deny any Jewish connection to the Mount. Last week, the Palestinian Authority's (PA) chief Islamic cleric issued a religious ruling declaring the entire Temple Mount area holy land for Islam.

Grand Mufti of Jerusalem Ikrima Sabri said the Temple Mount is holy to Muslims from "seven levels above and seven levels below" the Mount's surface.

Itamar Ben-Gvir, an activist with Kach – the outlawed anti-Arab group founded by Meir Kahane – said a plan is being prepared for thousands of Jews to march on the Temple Mount.

"Police will be unable to face the masses," he warned.

Leading rabbis are not sitting idly by as such threats are issued.

Rabbi Shmuel Rabinovich, the rabbi of the Western Wall, urged rabbis of all denominations to tell their congregations that it is absolutely forbidden to damage the mosques on the Temple Mount.

"One must state as clearly as possible that this is not the way of Judaism, and that the action of extremists can jeopardize 2,000 years of prayers at the Western Wall," he said.

Rabbi Rabinovich warned that a single fanatic could bring "horrible things to us."

Asked whether it was possible that anyone would take such action, Rabbi Rabinovich said that before the 1995 assassination of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, "We also did not believe that someone would take such an action and then justify it in the name of religion."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Arafat's rejectionism

According to Reports

In the New York Times Jan. 2, Tom Friedman captured the gist of the ongoing Middle East stalemate: "In Israel, virtually every party favours a peace deal with the Palestinians, and the debate is over how much to compromise. In the Arab world, the debate is over whether to compromise – with one group rejecting peace with Israel on any terms, and others advocating peace with Israel, but only if the Palestinians get 100 percent of what they want."

Now that Yasser Arafat, backed by Arab leaders, has, in effect, spurned Bill Clinton's compromise proposals, which Ehud Barak had accepted, as insufficient, he has illustrated Friedman's point: By insisting on 100 percent, including, foremost, the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel itself, he is leading his people into an abyss instead of towards statehood alongside Israel, his espoused goal.

Important elements of the Canadian media have not been oblivious to the contrast between Arafat and Barak and to the dead-end, rejectionist politics that the Palestinian Arab position on refugees represents.

To take but one example, in a significant editorial statement on Jan. 6 called "What of the Refugees," the Globe and Mail forcefully argued against the wholly unrealistic Palestinian insistence that Israel accept their "right" of return (even though such a right does not exist, and not in UN Resolution 194 where they wrongly claim it is "enshrined").

Refusing to relativize history to accommodate the Palestinian narrative, as some others do, the Globe adheres to the objective historical record and points out that by having rejected the UN Partition resolution in November 1947, and then having attacked Israel upon its creation in 1948, the Palestinians and Arabs bear responsibility for the creation of the Palestinian refugee plight in the first place; furthermore, they bear responsibility for perpetuating the plight of the refugees by using them as political pawns against Israel.

The Globe also acknowledges the "more than 500,000" Jewish refugees from Arab lands who, in contrast to the Arab treatment of the Palestinians, were immediately absorbed into the tiny Jewish state.

Finally, the Globe properly notes that if there is to be peace, the Palestinians must deal realistically with a solution to their refugee problem. Pursuing a policy to demographically destroy the Jewish state is not one of these.

Prepared by Paul Michaels, director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee.

The week in Israel

Jan. 8

• Thousands of Israelis streamed toward the Old City in Jerusalem for a mass protest against the U.S. proposal for Israel to cede control of the Temple Mount and areas of eastern Jerusalem to the Palestinians.

Jan. 9

• The chief Islamic cleric in Jerusalem, Ikrima Sabri, issued a ruling declaring the entire Temple Mount area holy land for Islam "from seven levels above and seven levels below" the Mount's surface. His comments confound the compromise offered by U.S. President Bill Clinton that the PA would control the surface of the Temple Mount and Israel below the surface.

Jan. 10

• Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein ordered an investigation into leaflets distributed in Arab communities two weeks ago denouncing Prime Minister Barak and Likud leader Ariel Sharon. The leaflets also threatened death to anyone who voted for either candidate in the upcoming prime ministerial election.

Jan. 11

• Gen. Suzi Yogev, chief of the IDF's women's corps, is slated to be appointed as Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz's advisor on women's issues by the end of the year. Her appointment will launch a new and more direct method of interaction on women's issues between advocates and the Chief of Staff and high army officials.

Jan. 12

• Israel has started to lift restrictions imposed on the PA since a car bomb exploded in Netanya on New Year's Day, following meetings held since Wednesday between Israeli and PA officials to discuss the resumption of co-operation in security matters.

Piano recital at Koffler features international artists

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two masters will join hands in a show of extraordinary musicianship.

"I'm very honoured to be playing with Alexander Tselyakov," said Fabio Mastrangelo about their upcoming duo piano recital featuring the works of Rachmaninoff, Chopin and Mozart.

Russian-born Tselyakov has appeared as a soloist at major festivals and concert halls around the world and has just recently returned from a musical tour of Paris, London, California and British Columbia.

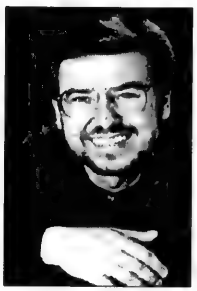
His awards have included the International Tchaikovsky Competition, the Tokyo International Piano Competition and the national Israeli competition. He has played recitals for such dignitaries as the late Yitzchak Rabin and Mikhail Gorbachev.

Tselyakov noted in an interview that his career began at the age of four, when his mother started teaching him the piano.

"She had great patience," he said.

After completing a high school for gifted musicians, Tselyakov went on to the Tchaikovsky Conservatory in Moscow to study with Lev Naumov, a student of the Heinrich Neuhaus methods – credited with producing such keyboard masters as Gilels and Richter.

By the time Tselyakov was in his 20s, he was teaching at two Russian institutes for music, as well as performing as a soloist.



Alexander Tselyakov

Now Canada is his home and he has begun to include Canadian composers in his repertoire.

"Srul Irving Glick is currently composing a piece for me to play on my upcoming tour of the Atlantic provinces," Tselyakov said.

The upcoming concert at the Koffler Centre will feature Tselyakov with another Canadian artist, Mastrangelo.

Mastrangelo is the founder and music director of Virtuosi di Toronto, a chamber orchestra whose members are drawn primarily from the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. He is also the musical director of the University of Toronto Hart House Chamber Strings and is a conducting instructor at the University of Toronto.

While Mastrangelo often tours as a conductor, he is also an award-winning pianist.

Mastrangelo was born in Italy, where he began his musical studies at the age of five with his father. Mastrangelo went on to study with Maria Tipo in Geneva and completed a Piano Performer Diploma at the Royal Academy of Music in London, England.

He went on to study with Leonard Bernstein in Vienna and at the Academy of Santa Cecilia in Rome.

"The upcoming concert at Koffler will give the audience an opportunity to see all the different ways that pianists can team up," Mastrangelo said.

Fabio Mastrangelo

The program will contain solos, duets on two pianos and a duo piano recital with Tselyakov and Mastrangelo both playing on one instrument.

This concert is part of an ongoing musical collaboration between the Italian and Jewish communities, Mastrangelo added.

In the spring, the Koffler School of Music and the Virtuosi de Toronto will be presenting a Mother's Day concert featuring Shlomo Mintz.

For further information and tickets regarding the two-piano concert featuring Tselyakov and Mastangello on Jan. 20 at 8 p.m, call the Koffler School of Music, 416-636-1880, ext. 228, or Na'amat Canada, 416-636-5425.

Love story set in wartime Berlin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Known as "submarines," they inhabited the murky depths of a nether world where detection was tantamount to a death sentence.

Hidden by friends or relatives, or passing as Christians with doctored papers, they were Jews living in 1940s Nazi Germany. Their survival hung by a slender thread.

Felice Schragenheim, a Berlin Jew who passed under a false name, was one of those so-called submarines. Her story, originally told in the book Aimee & Jaguar by Erica Fischer, has been skillfully brought to the screen by director Max Faberbock.

The film, in German with English subtitles, opens on Jan. 19 at the Alliance Atlantis Cumberland and Bayview cinemas.

Two hours long, Aimee & Jaguar is based on a true romantic relationship that, for its times, was not only shocking but unlikely.

It brought together two women whose lives probably would not have intersected under normal circumstances: Schragenheim, the lesbian Jew, and Lilly Wust, the conventional Aryan wife of a German soldier on active duty.

After first meeting at a concert abruptly interrupted by an Allied bombing raid, the pair meet again at a dusky cafe enlivened by sunny Latin American music.

The sexual energy between Felice and Lilly is apparent. But Lilly (Juliane Kohler), though fascinated by Felice (Maria Schrader), is confused.

As their friendship evolves, Felice kisses Lilly. Taken aback, Lilly slaps Felice. Despite Lilly's reaction, something inside her has drastically changed. Soon, they are writing passionate letters and poems to each other regularly.

They are deep into a love affair that Faberbock uses to good effect to illustrate the yawning chasm between the two women.

Masquerading as an Aryan, Felice works for a Nazi newspaper. In secret, she delivers information to a German resistance group.

As the mother of four boys, Lilly is an exemplar of the ideals of Nazi motherhood. But being a libertine, she has affairs with men before Felice is thrust into her life.

Set against the backdrop of a city reduced to rubble by Allied raids, the movie gives a viewer a glimpse of the terror the regime imposed on the remaining Jews of Berlin.

In an evocative scene, one of Felice's Jewish friends is chased in broad daylight by Gestapo agents, then shot and killed, after being unable to produce her personal documents.

Lilly, proud of her ability to sniff out Jews by their alleged scent, is initially unaware that Felice is Jewish. The issue surfaces when Lilly, overcome by jealousy, forces Felice to reveal her real identity.

"I'm Jewish, Lilly."

"You're what?"

This frenetic exchange, far from destroying their budding relationship, deepens it.

The lengths Lilly goes to insulate Felice against the deprivations of a cruel, race-mad government proves that people of different backgrounds can meet on common ground.

Unfolding in bitter-sweet flashbacks from Lilly's point of view, Aimee & Jaguar seethes with raw emotions, capturing the nuances and passions of their improbable affair.

The film's success is due in part to the lead players, Juliane Kohler and Maria Schrader, whose modulated performances are consistently striking.

Faberbock, in his debut as a director, portrays the Felice/Lilly liaison with tact, sensitivity and artistry. He distills the grim, uncertain mood of war-time Germany with restraint and realism. In short, Aimee & Jaguar hits all the right notes.

Not surprisingly, it was Germany's submission for best foreign-language film at last year's Oscar awards ceremony in Los Angeles.

Secondary actors steal show in Zadie's Shoes

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Two actors who are not the leads steal the show in Zadie's Shoes, which opened recently at the Factory Theatre for a run until Feb. 4.

Veteran Paul Soles is a standout as the synagogue elder Eli Shifman, who guides Benjamin, (Jordan Pettle, brother of the writer), a compulsive gambler, back to the straight and narrow. And the unheralded Randy Hughson as Benjamin's friend, a cocaine addict and alcoholic who has been "dry" for 23 days, acts out wonderful lines (once you get used to his obscenities) which mark playwright Adam Pettle as a comer.

Anyone who can create such a new, major character as "Bear" is clearly talented.

To enjoy Zadie's Shoes, you must shed the baggage that seeks an uncluttered plot and realistic backgrounds. This play has neo-modern staging, with the actors scattered in stadium-like rows, emoting monologues. It also has sub-plots involving Benjamin and his girlfriend Ruth (Kelli Fox), who has cancer; and her two sisters, who have lives and problems of their own but end up supporting Ruth and going to Mexico with her. There she undergoes coffee enemas as part of her treatment.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

THREE SUN-DRENCHED DESTINATIONS

To paraphrase the song: The wind is blowing/ the snow is snowing/ but I can weather the storm/ I've got my holiday memories to keep me warm...

How well I remember the day I joined a group excursion to a Karen hill tribe village in the northern Thai province of Chiang Mai, in the foothills of the Himalayan mountains. The village was a clumsy conspiracy of shacks, surrounded by dense jungle. It was filled with pigs, chickens, hanging laundry and unwashed children with smiling faces and outstretched palms.

The kids were intrigued by my wristwatch. Running water and electricity were recent additions to the village, which boasted an old-fashioned washing machine but no television.

The villagers welcomed us into their huts: they had pots, pans and clothing but little else. Back outside, they presented blankets, tablecloths, beaded purses, cloth bags, straps, headbands and other homemade items for sale. Bargaining generously, we still walked away with unique goods at prices unheard of in North America.

We visited many other exotic destinations in Thailand: an elephant camp, a cashew plant, an umbrella factory, a butterfly and orchid farm. On the grounds of centuries-old Buddhist temples, we encountered orange-robed monks and ladies carrying small packets woven from dried leaves. In each package was a tiny live bird. For a few Baht one made a wish and released the bird back into nature.

We explored a camp of sea gypsies, a Muslim fishing village on stilts above the open sea, the marketplaces of Chiang Mai, Phuket and Bangkok. Nearly everything we saw in Thailand was different from what we might have expected or experienced back home.

I subsequently discovered that, according to Kulanu, the American organization whose mission is to find and redeem the lost Jewish tribes, some of the Karen practise rites that resemble Jewish religious ceremonies. Some observers consider them a remnant of a lost tribe!

A longstanding government edict prohibits white-coloured buildings in Willemsted, capital of the Caribbean island of Curacao. As a result, much of the city's handsome Dutch colonial architecture is painted bright creamy yellow or orange.

Languishing in tropical heat, refreshed by constant tradewinds, Curacao is one of the ABC islands of the Netherland Antilles, situated some 63 kilometres north of Venezuela. Docked beside the Queen Emma floating bridge is a "floating market" of ships that arrive every morning from that country with fresh fruits and vegetables for sale.

In addition to the Governor's Palace, there are numerous old military forts and plantation landhouses to explore around the island, as well as a few pitiful huts left over from slaving days, which ended in 1863.

Established in 1632, Willemstad's Mikve-Israel is said to be the oldest surviving synagogue in the New World, and receives thousands of visitors yearly.

Israel's Upper Galilee is famed for many things, including natural beauty, archeological ruins, and being the source of the Jordan River. One could easily spend much time here, touring parks, ancient sites, museums and towns like Kiryat Shmonah and the fascinating mystical jewel known as Safed.

The towering forests and rippling waterways of the small but scenic Dan Nature Reserve sharply contradict Israel's image as a desert country. Hikers encounter rushing creeks and tranquil pools of water, sweet and pure. Emerging from rock springs, these are the frothy headwaters of the Jordan. Soon one emerges at a clearing where the ancient city of Tel Dan is being excavated. Formerly a Canaan city-state named Leshem or Laish, the city was taken over by the biblical tribe of Dan.

It's often been said that anywhere you stick a shovel in the earth in Israel, you find something of interest, and it's certainly true in the Upper Galilee. Kazrin features the remains of a Jewish town of the talmudic period, Banyas offers the ruins of an ancient city and the pre-medieval Nimrod Fortress, and Hazor has the ruins of an ancient city that became one of King Solomon's chariot towns.

Zadie is worth watching despite its rough spots

On Eli's recommendation, Benjamin had wagered the money for the sisters' air tickets on a horse named Lost Pal (which wins as a 17 to 1 long shot), but this is almost lost in the shuffle of other plots.

The ending is upbeat, with Ruth recovering after Benjamin comes to grip with his gambling dereliction.

Eli's soliloquies in the synagogue deal humorously with Jewish ways, remonstrating with "boytchik" for not attending services for 15 years since his bar mitzvah, and reminding him that "if Jews were not pushy, we would not have Israel."

Along the way, he reveals his own weakness for gambling, and gives Benjamin a tallit and a prayer book. He asks Benjamin's grandfather, who lost his shoes to a straight flush in Poland before coming to Canada, to tell him the paths not to follow. There is genuine tension in this scene, an emotional highlight of the play.

Soles' dual role as Benjamin's father, who passes his gambling addiction to his son, and as Eli, is critical, and his opening monologue about the bettor who lived by the number 8, including his horse which ran eighth, is a jewel.

As Ruth's sisters, Torri Higginson, the control freak, and Juno Mills-Cockell, the Buddhist who is carrying Bear's baby, add interest for anyone who can follow their cavortings.

Despite its good qualities, however, there are rough spots in Zadie's Shoes and the script needs tightening, despite the efforts of director Jackie Maxwell, former artistic director of Factory Theatre.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

PREDEADLINE FOR SUBMISSIONS TO FILM FESTIVAL

Filmmakers, take note that Feb. 10 is the deadline for submissions for any films to be considered for the ninth edition of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF).

According to Shlomo Schwartzberg, the TJFF's director of programming, dates of the upcoming festival have been set for April 26 to May 3. Anyone interested in receiving information on the festival by e-mail is requested to forward their e-mail address to tjff@interlog.com.

Incidentally, the TJFF has moved offices. Its new address is 17 Madison Ave., Toronto M5R 2S2. The phone numbers haven't changed: phone 416-324-8226, fax 416-324-8668.

By the way, that was Schwartzberg introducing the very well attended series of classic Yiddish films recently at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, 3080 Bayview Ave. The series continues in 2001 with free screenings of Mamele on Jan. 21, The Cantor's Son on Feb. 18, and The Jolly Paupers with comedians Dzigan and Schumacher on March 18.

All dates are Sundays at 7 p.m. For further information, call 416-221-3433.

Musical Notes: Children of five to 12 and their families should enjoy award-winning violinist Lenny Solomon's musical accompaniment of Barbara Budd's reading of the Roch Carrier story, The Hockey Sweater. Tickets $8. Sunday Jan. 21, 1 p.m. Du Maurier Theatre, 231 Queens Quay W. 416-973-4000.

• John McDermott, Toronto's own Scottish-born tenor, performs Scottish folk classics and ballads in a Robert Burns Day concert, with pipers, dancers and musicians Erica Goodman, Anne Lindsay, Ray Legere, Bill Bridges and Jack Zaza. $29.50-$46.50. Roy Thomson Hall, Sunday Jan. 28, 2 p.m. 416-872-4255.

The Schmigeggy Way: Schmigeggy Productions has an innovative approach to theatre. Working within a tight time frame, producer-director Adam Lazarus and the Schmigeggy team find a downtown setting, convert it into a performance space, and assemble some actors who improvise for a few days, then present a public performance. The intimacy of the performer-audience relationship has always been a characteristic of the company's performances.

The New Millennium Schmigeggy tells the stories of six geniuses of varying professions. Runs Jan. 26 thru 28. Adults $12; discounts apply for advance reservations. Nightwood Theatre Studio Space, 9 St. Nicholas St., 6th floor. 416-837-2001.

More Dramatic Notes: Solar Stage Children's Theatre presents Tales of Anansi the Spider, a famous arachnid from West Africa. Suitable for kindergarten to 3. $8.50. Jan. 14, 21, 28 & Feb. 4, 11 a.m. & 2 p.m. 4950 Yonge St. (Madison Centre, concourse level). 416-368-8031.

• The Morris Winchevsky School celebrates Martin Luther King Jr. Day with special guest Veronica Sullivan in a program of storytelling and crafts. January 21 at 11 a.m. at the Winchevsky Centre, 585 Cranbrooke Ave., Toronto. 416-789-5502.

Sandwich Generation: Are you part of the "sandwich generation"? Producers for a new documentary series for WTN are seeking women of the "sandwich generation", caught between children, aging parents, relatives, careers, who are willing to share their stories on camera. Contact Donna at 416-925-0111 or storyvine@yahoo.ca. The series is expected to air in the spring.

At the Koffler Gallery: A series of female torsos clad in skin-tight black sheaths, strapless cocktail dresses and voluminous party frocks is the focus of Little Black Dress, an exhibition of oil pastels by Cathy Daley.

"What is portrayed is the iconography of the dress; the garment that frames, and contains, a complex array of cultural, esthetic, political and personal issues."

Koffler Gallery, Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. Until Feb. 25. 416-636-1880, ext. 380.

More Visual Arts: Photograms, an exhibition of photographs by David Miller, opened this week at the Lonsdale Gallery. The show features a variety of photographs, installations, site-works and sculptures by Miller, who, according to a press release, has done "extensive research in the representation of atrocity." Until Feb. 17 at 410 Spadina Rd. 416-487-8733.

Genetic disorder found among Ashkenazi Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — We take for granted that our body will respond properly to stress, that our blood pressure and body temperature will regulate themselves, that when we eat or drink, the food will digest properly, that we won't stop breathing when we sleep.

For those children with familial dysautonomia (FD), each of those functions can become a major, often life-threatening concern.

Familial dysautonomia is a genetic disorder of the autonomic and sensory nervous systems responsible for such basic body functions as blood pressure regulation, breathing, swallowing and digestion. It is estimated that one in 30 Ashkenazi Jews carry the gene. When both parents carry the gene, they run a one-in-four chance with each pregnancy that they will produce a child with familial dysautonomia.

One out of 3,600 Ashkenazi births is a child with familial dysautonomia, not an insignificant proportion. With the Russian immigration to the west, the number may well be higher.

"It is difficult to be told that your child has something you gave it," Judy Zauder told The CJN. Her 19-year-old son Michael has the condition, as do Deborah Melamed's eight-year-old daughter Alanna, and Monica Taryan's son Bennie, age seven.

The three mothers had invited The CJN to hear what life is like for those coping with FD. And they have a lot to cope with.

Some of the symptoms include poor muscle tone, severe difficulty swallowing, crying without tears, poor temperature control with unexplained very high fevers or very low temperatures, wide swings in blood pressure, vomiting, decreased or no reaction to pain, sweating, blotchy skin, no taste buds and spinal curvature.

Although there is no cure as yet, with early diagnosis, it is possible for the children to lead a more normal life.

Taryan said that any time Ashkenzi parents have a baby who has poor muscle tone, can't feed, has mottled skin (because of the poor circulation to the extremities) and has severe respiratory problems, a histamine test – which is 100 percent accurate – should be done.

"Of course, those symptoms can have other explanations, too," she said, which is why the disorder is so often misdiagnosed.

Furthermore, some babies have only some of the symptoms, Melamed added.

The first thing that is done after diagnosis is fundoplication, a procedure that tightens the area between the muscles and the esophagus.

The sphincter at the bottom of the esophagus, which usually opens and closes automatically when we eat, is uncontrolled in these children. Since the lungs are not sealed during the swallowing reflex, food particles and liquids can enter the breathing passages and cause infections and pneumonia.

Familial dysautonomia

While many children can be taught to swallow solids, few can drink, and they must take liquids around the clock through a gastric tube, which also supplies supplementary calories.

The extra calories are necessary because of the children's rapid metabolism, and also because, since they have no taste buds, they have no particular enjoyment in eating.

The parents get very creative with making extremely spicy and overly sweet foods, Melamed, Taryan and Zauder agreed.

And one of the most frightening things that can happen, the women agreed, is what they all simply referred to as "crisis." Everything in the body goes into spasm, Melamed said. The child can't eat or drink, gets a dangerously high fever, shakes and vomits. This may last for hours, days or even months.

The only solution is to give them drugs that knock them out until the crisis passes.

Since the children's body can't react to stress, a simple emotional reaction can rapidly escalate to a serious state, which may have to be regulated by anti-anxiety drugs such as Valium.

"We get butterflies in our stomach. They get elephants," is the way Melamed described it.

They all have learning disabilities, to a greater or lesser degree. Zauder explained that the children's problems "may not stem from actual learning difficulties, but [arise] because they find it hard to find themselves in their space."

Many need support in school, which may range from an educational assistant to fine motor support to full-time nursing.

Treatment is available at the New York Medical Centre Dysautonomia Treatment and Evaluation Centre, under Dr. Felicia Axelrod, who has done much of the seminal work on familial dysautonomia. It is understood that yearly trips there are part of the families' lifestyle.

There is also a treatment centre at the Mt. Scopus campus of Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem.

Genetic research is being carried out by James Gusella at Harvard University at the Massachusetts General Hospital.

The Toronto chapter of the Dysautonomia Foundation is trying to raise its profile in the community, not only to disseminate information about the condition and encourage fundraising, but also to raise awareness among parents and health professionals.

For more information, call the foundation at 905-882-7725. There are also several helpful Web sites, including www.familialdysautonomia.org and www.med.nyu.edu/fd/fdcenter.html.

Mother and son team up in Midnight Sun

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Maja Ardal and her son Paul Braunstein are front and centre in Midnight Sun, a play about the "incredible composite of cultures" in Iceland.

Ardal is the writer and Braunstein has the lead as Sgt. Joe Swing, one of the American soldiers who wrought a major change in Icelandic society in 1942.

"My family is half Jewish and half Icelandic, as I married a Jew. So we know something about two cultures," Icelandic-born Ardal said. Her husband is Jeff Braunstein, an actor she met at a Toronto Workshop play who now produces industrial shows. And daughter Inga is an actress and singer.

Midnight Sun previews at Tarragon Theatre Jan. 16, with its regular run Jan. 23 to Feb. 25. It is a musical with lots of jazz, mirroring the fantastic change in Iceland's culture with the arrival in World War II of American servicemen.

"My cousin and I grew up at that time, and we surrendered to the allure of American popular culture," Ardal said.

The play, a work of fiction, charts the clash between American swing and the Icelanders' mystical response to their own fierce landscape.

The jazzy ease of the U.S. soldiers helps to trigger a sometimes exhilarating, sometimes painful clash between imagination and reality.

The play takes place in the small community of Strandvik in the north of Iceland in the days leading up to Midsummer Eve, when the sun does not set.

Ardal came to Kingston, Ont., in 1970 when the family joined her father who had taken a position as professor of moral philosophy at Queen's University. Until then the family had divided its time between Scotland, where her father taught, and Iceland.

She began Midnight Sun, her first play, as a member of the Tarragon/Chalmers Playwrights Unit. Joining her son in the cast are Matthew Edison as a scholar and journalist, Nicky Guadagni as a stern, hardened widow, Holly Lewis as an adolescent looking for her own Oz, Jeff Madden as a jazz musician and prodigal son, and Karl Matchett as the singer who has no heart for singing.

The co-directors are Andy McKim and Patricia Vanstone, and the musical director is John Roby. The price for the previews is $16 (with a PWYC matinee Jan. 21), the regular run is $23 to $29, with Sunday PWYC matinees, and special prices for seniors and students are $19 to $24. For information, call 416-531-1827.

Israel & the Jewish World

JERUSALEM UNITED: Israelis line up at the Old City walls in Jerusalem at the Jaffa Gate (rear) and wave flags in support of keeping the city united during a demonstration Jan. 8, 2001. The issue of Jerusalem's future is one of the key points in both the upcoming Israeli election and in any future peace deal with the Palestinians. Tens of thousands of Israelis poured into Jerusalem to surround the Old City walls in a demonstration against any partition of the holy city in a future peace deal with the Palestinians. Quarterback follows his dream to the NFL

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — It's been a season of historic accomplishments for Miami Dolphins quarterback Jay Fiedler.

Fiedler led the Dolphins to the second round of the NFL playoffs, but in doing so, he became the first Jew to start as a quarterback since the legendary Sid Luckman earned Hall of Fame honours with the Chicago Bears from 1939-50.

To the Dolphins, who bowed out of the playoff race following a 27-0 drubbing at the hands of the Oakland Raiders, Fiedler is a reincarnated Luckman, with the leadership skills to match. Under Fiedler's leadership, the Dolphins finished as one of the elite teams in the NFL with a 12-6 won-loss record. This past season, the 28-year-old from the Long Island suburb of Oceanside overcame injuries to himself and his receiving corps to dazzle fans and local sportswriters, who had anticipated that the Dolphins would finish last in their division following the retirement of the legendary Dan Marino.

"Jay has proven to be solid as a quarterback and we have faith in his ability to improve our standing," said Dolphins head coach Dave Wannstedt.

"Jay is a smart guy who makes good decisions in a game. The way he asks questions, he's always thinking ahead. He sees the big picture," added quarterback coach Mike Shula.

The big picture, of course, is to win the Super Bowl. Despite falling three victories short of that ultimate goal, Fiedler showed enough promise to stir hopes for next season. In a Dec. 3 game against the Buffalo Bills – his first game back after a neck injury – he passed for three touchdowns (a career high), 214 yards, and led the team to a 33-6 thrashing of the Bills.

In an Oct. 1 31-16 win over the Cincinnati Bengals, Fielder proved to be a great scrambler, running for 45 yards on four carries, including a career-long 30-yarder.

Though the Dolphins are blessed with five top defensive stars who were chosen to the AFC's Pro Bowl team, the Dolphins rely heavily on Fiedler to make the difference between victory and defeat. On Dec. 10 against Tampa Bay, Fiedler suffered a left shoulder (non-throwing) injury. Despite a strong defensive effort in the game, the Dolphins fell to the Buccaneers 16-13. A week later they were beaten by the Indianapolis Colts 20-13. Though he played in those losses, his performances were not up to par as he threw five interceptions in the two games.

"I was disappointed. I can't make any excuses," Fiedler said after the loss to the Bucs. "I won't use the shoulder as an excuse. I am confident the team will continue to win into the playoffs."

Fiedler's prophecy came true. He was outstanding in leading the Dolphins to a 27-24 win over the New England Patriots, ensuring a berth in the playoffs. In the next game, Fiedler made a legend of himself – at least for one game – leading the Fish to a thrilling,unexpected 23-17 overtime win over the Colts in the Wild Card round of the playoffs.

The dramatic OT victory at home will long be remembered in Dolphins circles for the way Fiedler turned the game around after a disappointing first half. In the first 30 minutes, he threw three interceptions, putting the Dolphins down 14-0 at the half. Fiedler looked terrible, completing only five of 14 passes for 42 yards and enduring the boos of the hometown fans.

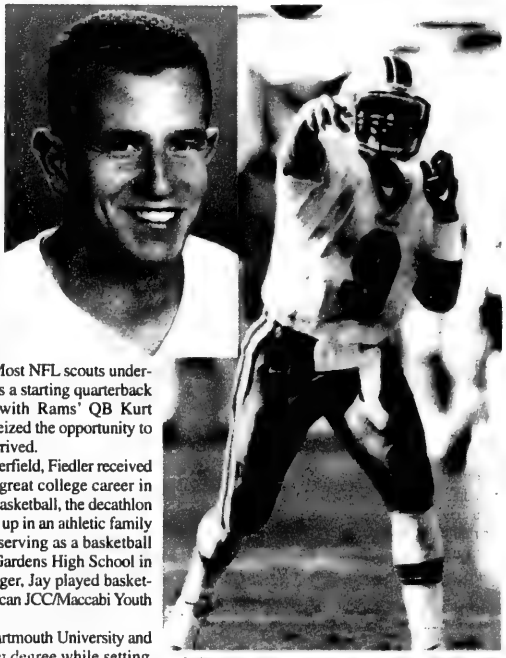
"I wasn't playing well early on," he said. "I wasn't surprised to be booed. But my teammates still had confidence in me, and the coaches still had confidence in me. That's all that really mattered."

At halftime, the Dolphins – and Fielder – made some adjustments. He transformed himself from a kid who didn't appear to belong in the big league to a hybrid of Luckman and Marino, combining their best talents. He threw with authority, completing 14 of 20 passes for 143 yards, including one touchdown and no interceptions. He was smart enough to leave the running to Lamar Smith, who responded with a record 209 yards in the game.

Fiedler made his best plays just when the Dolphins needed them most. With less than a minute remaining in the game, Fiedler completed a nine-yard touchdown pass to right end Jed Weaver, tying the score at 17. In overtime, he engineered the winning drive, culminating in Smith's 17-yard touchdown run.

Despite the subsequent blowout by the Raiders – which started when Fiedler threw an early interception that was returned for a touchdown – the Dolphins can consider their season a relative success. Preseason football mavens had the Dolphins pegged for last place.

Fielder's personal success can be considered miraculous, considering the winding road he took to get to a starting role. When the Dolphins signed Fiedler to a three-year $2.8-million contract last February as Marino's successor, there were plenty of naysayers. Most NFL scouts underestimated his ability as a starting quarterback (they did the same with Rams' QB Kurt Warner), but Fiedler seized the opportunity to show he had finally arrived.



Miami Dolphins quarterback Jay Fiedler

Like Rodney Dangerfield, Fiedler received no respect, despite a great college career in which he excelled in basketball, the decathlon and football. Jay grew up in an athletic family with his father, Ken, serving as a basketball coach at Springfield Gardens High School in New York. As a teenager, Jay played basketball in the North American JCC/Maccabi Youth Games.

Fiedler attended Dartmouth University and earned an engineering degree while setting school passing records. He led the team to a 21-7 record. After graduating in 1994, he was passed over in the NFL draft and was signed as a free agent by the Philadelphia Eagles. After a stint as the team's third-string quarterback, he saw more bench duty with the Bengals in 1995. By the 1996-97 season, he was out of the NFL, later taking a job for $1,000 as the receivers' coach at Hofstra University.

Despite possessing an engineering degree, Fiedler insisted on pursing a football career.

In 1998, he returned to the NFL as a backup with the Minnesota Vikings. He later backed up Mark Brunell of the Jacksonville Jaguars. When given a chance to start for the Jags on Jan. 2, 2000, he completed 28 of 39 passes for 317 yards in a 24-7 victory over Cincinnati. He followed that up with a strong playoff performance in relief, helping the Jaguars to a 62-7 landslide win over the Dolphins.

"The biggest thing I tell kids when they see me is what I said to myself. If you have a dream, go after it with all your heart. Do everything you feel you need to do and can do to fulfil that dream and don't let anyone tell you differently," he said.

"Fiedler inspires us all," said Dolphins guard Mark Dixon. "You don't make it to the NFL when everybody and their brother wants to cut you and tells you to go coach high school unless you believe in yourself."

As the Dolphins starting QB, Fiedler has already earned some lucrative endorsement contracts, one with Meridian USA Holding of Boca Raton and another with Braman Automobiles. Both are owned by local Jewish businessmen.

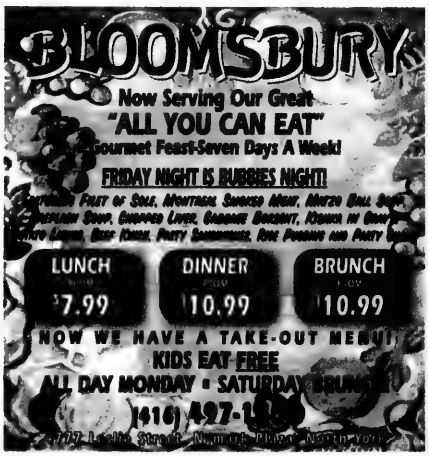
"Jay's a great Jewish role model because of his wholesomeness," said Alan Posner, CEO of Meridian and a member of the board of directors of Chabad of South Florida and of the Jewish National Fund. "He has the right priorities for me, a kid who loves his family and [has] a strong bond with education. He is one of the very few athletes that kids can look up to and truly emulate."

Fiedler's story inspires athletes everywhere who look for a second chance. Being Jewish seemed to make the odds of getting into the NFL a little more remote.

"A lot of people thought that a Jewish guy wouldn't even start playing football for a living. My parents encouraged me. I grew up in a Reform home and have always been proud of my Jewish heritage," he said.

Fiedler, who often wears a gray "Jewish Sports Hall of Fame" T-shirt in the Dolphins' training facilities, was granted the "Good Guy Award" by the Hall of Fame last April.

He will likely become a sought-after speaker in the Jewish community. "Jay will become popular in Miami, because the Jewish community is enamoured with any athlete who is Jewish," said Judge Ed Newman, who was an all-pro lineman with the Dolphins from 1973-85.



Stories that touch the heart

By ELI RUBENSTEIN ALEC GELCER

A mother's golden rule

I heard this story several years ago at a UJA Young Leadership Conference in Washington D.C. It was told by American Jewish newspaper columnist, Jeffrey Zaslow.

A young Jewish woman went to a Jewish singles dance. Her mother was waiting when she came home, hoping for the best, but instead of telling her she had a great time, the girl regaled her with a scathing description of some incredible nerd who tried to dance with her. In essence, she told her mother, it takes a lot of nerve for anyone to dance with a person as weird and ugly as he was.

Her mom replied sadly: "You know, this boy that you find ugly and stupid is some mother's pride and joy. Her eyes light up when she sees him. When he went out tonight, she waited for him, just like I waited for you, hoping to hear that he had a nice time at the dance. But when he comes home, she'll see his face and know that someone hurt him and it will break her heart. So next time a boy asks you to dance, before you turn him down or make fun of him or treat him as if he is nothing, just remember, every boy is some mother's son."

Lost souls

An American friend of mine, Karen, recalls an incident that happened to her almost 20 years ago when she was still a student. Standing outside a club with a friend of hers, she noticed two young men at the entrance, shouting out numbers as various women entered or left the club.

"Seven," "Three," "Six," "Nine," they yelled, then laughed wildly after each pronouncement. The two young women realized the men were rating (on a scale from one to ten) the physical attractiveness of all the women who were entering or exiting the club.

Karen approached the "judges." "Do you realize how insulting your actions are?" she protested.

One of the young men paused for a moment, then looked her in the eye and said, "I don't know why I am wasting my time with you, when I could be chatting with your much better-looking friend…"

Karen gazed at the man sadly, then said, "I may not look like a Greek goddess to you. But, ultimately, what people really value in others is not just what's on outside, but what's lies inside – their kindness, their warmth, their sense of humour, their ability to love – it's called soul. And I happen to have a soul that's sweet, passionate, and full of fun. But it's a soul you will never get to know – and that's sad, for you. Because you and your friend get very low soul-ratings from me. I'm not even sure you merit a one or a two.

"To me you both appear to be lost souls," she concluded.

Startled by her words, the young men stood speechless. Then, with a nod to each other, they headed back toward the club. As they turned away, Karen hoped her words remained with them. Perhaps at some point, she thought, this encounter might have an impact, however modest, on the way they treated others in their path.

WE SELL KitchenAid FOR LESS

1/2 cup onion, chopped	1/4 cup fresh parsley, chopped
32 oz. tin spaghetti sauce	1/2 tsp. pepper
12 oz. bowtie pasta	1/2 tsp. salt
1 lb. ricotta cheese	1 cup mozzarella cheese, shredded
1 egg	Parmesan cheese, grated (optional)

Sauté onion until tender. Stir in spaghetti sauce; bring to a boil, then reduce heat and simmer 15 minutes. Meanwhile, cook bowties in boiling water for 7 minutes; drain. Heat oven to 375°F.
In large bowl, blend ricotta cheese with egg, parsley, pepper, and salt. In rectangular baking dish, 9x13x2, spread sauce. Evenly place 1/3 of the hot cooked bowties on top; cover with 1/2 of cheese mixture, sprinkle with 1 cup mozzarella. Repeat layers, ending with bowties. Sprinkle Parmesan cheese on top. Cover with aluminum foil and bake 23-30 minutes. Remove foil and bake additional 5 minutes or until hot and bubbly.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Helen and I go way back to when we were kids. Our families lived on the same street and we both attended the same schools. We are now in university and live on campus, but don't hang with the same people.

Helen has fallen in love with John. He is not Jewish and I know she hasn't told her parents about him. Being active members of a Conservative synagogue, they will be heartbroken!

She spent Christmas with his family up north but she told her parents she was going skiing with friends, which left me in a very uncomfortable position when I had to lie for her.

John is an OK guy but because of his background I don't see how she plans to work him into her life. I feel like I need to say something, but I don't know where to begin. Help me out please.

Against Intermarriage

Dear Against Intermarriage,

This is quite a bag of problems: a possible interfaith marriage, lying, imposing on friends and confrontation.

First of all, I don't think your friend is looking at the larger picture at the moment: the unity of the Jewish people. She is keeping this a secret from her family because she is dreading the negative reaction she anticipates and she doesn't want to hurt her parents.

I am going to assume that Helen is reasonably intelligent and will think out the obvious problems involved in an interfaith marriage. This is where you come in. Help her talk this through. Get some literature on the questions of raising children, and struggling with the parents and extended families on each side.

Here is also where you put your foot down and refuse to lie for her. Let her know you will be there for her to talk and listen, but that she may not put you in that position again.

John may be a wonderful man with very genuine qualities that overpower her Jewish ideals. In the end it will be her decision and her life. Just be there to help.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

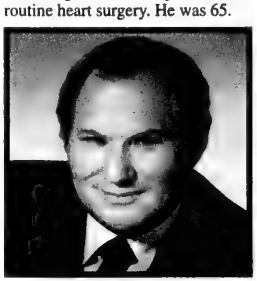
Respected actor dead at 65

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "The King will never die in the hearts of Canadians," lawyer Eddie Greenspan, a longtime personal friend of Al Waxman, said at the actor's funeral last Friday.

Waxman, one of Canada's most popular and well-respected actors, died last week from complications following what was expected to be routine heart surgery. He was 65.



Al Waxman

Greenspan noted that Waxman's death was treated by the news media with the attention usually reserved for a great statesman.

"He was on the front page of every newspaper in Canada, the first item on every news broadcast." Much of this was because Waxman had managed to keep his Canadian identity while still becoming a star, Greenspan said.

Waxman was probably best known for his roles as Larry King in King of Kensington, from 1975 to 1980, and as Lt. Bert Samuel in Cagney & Lacey, which ran from 1981 to 1985.

'11th-hour' talks begin in Taba

The decision by Prime Minister Ehud Barak (top) to hold talks with the PA has been criticized by many politicians and officials. Likud candidate Ariel Sharon (below) is expected to raise the subject in the campaign for the Feb. 6 prime ministerial elections. Seen here are images from the first night of TV ads last week, which include Russian subtitles to woo Russian language voters. [Israel photos]

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian negotiating teams began intensive talks Sunday at the Egyptian coastal resort of Taba on the Gulf of Aqaba. The talks are seen as a desperate bid on both sides to reach some form of framework agreement before Israel's Feb. 6 election for prime minister.

The decision to hold the 11th-hour talks just two weeks before the election has drawn severe criticism, not only from Likud candidate Ariel Sharon, but also from ministers in Prime Minister Ehud Barak's cabinet.

Sharon accused Barak of trying to organize a coup on the eve of the election, and suggested that the prime minister lacks legitimacy, since only 30 MKs support him.

Three ministers also voiced harsh criticism of the talks. At the weekly cabinet meeting, Dalia Itzik, Haim Ramon and Benyamin Ben-Eliezer said the decision to start the talks was "inappropriate and unethical."

Ramon, the interior minister, said it was not appropriate to embark on major negotiations at Taba at the height of an election campaign, and that the decision raised questions of proper government practice and legitimacy.

"This could come back like a boomerang under a different government in a similar period," Ramon warned. He said that with former U.S. president Bill Clinton no longer in the picture, it would be more appropriate to wait until after the election to continue the process.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Poverty Forum

VANCOUVER — A forum on poverty in the Jewish community here is scheduled for Jan. 28. Initiated by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, the day-long forum has been backed by 19 other communal agencies. A recent study by Carleton University Prof. Allan Moscovitch found that 17 percent of Canadian Jews are poor, and 27 percent of those are children and young people.

ISRAEL

Female Guards

JERUSALEM — For the first time, the Israel Defence Force is assigning female soldiers to guard Jewish settlements. According to reports, the soldiers, who serve in the artillery corps, will be stationed at settlements in the northern West Bank.

Patrol Permit

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials granted Hebron settlers permission to form an armed civil guard that will patrol the area, the Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported. The paper quoted a police spokesperson as saying the guard would be expected to operate lawfully.

Divorce Rate Up

JERUSALEM — The divorce rate among Jewish couples in Israel is rising. At 30 percent, though, it is still lower than the rate in Western countries. According to figures released by the director general of the rabbinical courts, 9,153 couples divorced last year, the greatest number in Tel Aviv.

WORLD

Rabbi Attacked

BERLIN — Rabbi Walter Rothschild says he has no plans to leave Germany or change his routine following an attack earlier this month. The rabbi was punched after he stepped in to stop a fracas between three youths and the driver of a subway train. The rabbi required several stitches. All three youths were arrested.

Croatia Agrees

ZAGREB — Croatia's president has agreed to back his country's prosecution of alleged Nazi war criminals, according to the Jerusalem office of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. Stjepan Mesic also agreed to support a Holocaust education project that will be translated into Croatian for use in schools and cultural institutions throughout the country. The Wiesenthal Centre had refused to meet with Mesic's predecessor, Franjo Tudjman, because of what it called his glorification of Croatia's fascist wartime government.

Visa Revoked

WASHINGTON — The U.S. State Department has revoked the visa of an Israeli extremist. The move against Baruch Marzel, a former leader of Kach, is part of a general U.S. crackdown against Jewish extremist groups linked to members of the slain Kahane family.

Hezbollah Online

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is calling on Microsoft and Amazon.com to remove banner advertisements from the Web site of Hezbollah. The Web site boasts a Microsoft banner on its English language section and a banner promoting Amazon.com in its Arabic section. In a letter to Microsoft founder Bill Gates, Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the centre, urged the company to remove the banner.

Compensation Deal

VIENNA — Jewish Holocaust survivors won a compensation deal from the government last week for assets seized when Austria was part of the Third Reich. Under the deal, the government and Austrian companies will add $210 million (US) to a general fund, bringing the fund's total amount, with interest and previous pledges, to $380 million. Survivors who had assets seized, or their heirs, are entitled to $7,000 each.

Survivors Excluded

WARSAW — Poland's parliament has passed a bill that would give former owners of property seized between 1944 and 1962 half the value of their lost assets. But because the bill restricts payments to those who held Polish citizenship at the end of 1999, it will exclude most Jewish Holocaust survivors, who joined a class-action lawsuit in the United States for the return of their property.

Liberation Marked

ROME — The anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz has been established as an official day of Holocaust remembrance in several European countries. In Italy, Jan. 27 will be the occasion for numerous cultural and memorial events.

Joining For El Salvador Relief

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress, UIA Federations Canada, UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto and FEDERATION CJA in Montreal have joined with Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, to raise funds for food and medicine to send to the victims of the devastating earthquake in El Salvador.

The Canadian Jewish consortium will work with the American Jewish World Service, which has a strong presence on the ground in El Salvador, and La Coordinadora/ Foundation for Self Sufficiency.

In addition Ve'ahavta will work directly with the Israeli Humanitarian Aid Organization (LATET) to provide food and emergency health care in El Salvador.

Contributions clearly marked for relief for El Salvador can be sent to: Canadian Jewish Congress Special Relief Fund, 1590 Ave. Docteur Penfield, Montreal, Que., H3G 1C5; UJA Federation Toronto, 4600 Bathurst St. Toronto, Ont. Multi-faith leaders call for end to poverty

Letter to PM urges new initiatives to help children and families

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — More than 100 multi-faith leaders met recently to sign an open letter to Prime Minister Jean Chrétien, calling on him to take initiatives to end child and family poverty.

Out of the Cold affirms dignity of homeless

Please see page 5

The meeting, held at Temple Emanu-El, was organized by The Campaign Against Child Poverty (CACP), a coalition of 13 faith communities, public interest and child advocacy groups, family service organizations, charities, representatives from medicine and the corporate world, and others who are concerned about the increasing numbers of poor and inadequately cared for children in Canada.

The letter, to be published in a daily newspaper in April, appeals to government leaders and all Canadians "for immediate, compassionate action against child poverty."

Among its arguments, the letter states, "In the midst of unprecedented national prosperity, this threat to the future of so many of our children and their families is simply unacceptable... We and the vast majority of Canadians, do not and should not accept that such poverty should exist in the midst of such plenty."

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El and a member of the CACP steering committee, said that helping children is the only way to create a community based on goodness and morality.

"We will all experience pain, and if we have answered the cries of others, perhaps when we cry, they will hear us," said Rabbi Bielfeld.

"The year 2000 marks the deadline to the promise made by the House of Commons in 1989 to seek to achieve the goal of eliminating child poverty among Canadian children by 2000."

Since then, he said, among other statistics, the number of poor children has increased by 91 percent; the number of children in working poor families has increased by 103 percent; children in families experiencing long-term unemployment have increased by 62 percent; social assistance benefits for parents with children have decreased by 19 percent; and annual provincial allocation for regulated child care has decreased by 18 percent.

Poor children are described as those who live in families whose total income falls below the low income cutoff, in which a family spends over 55 percent of their gross annual income on food, shelter and clothing.

Having children growing up poor, does "costly and long-lasting damage to our country and to our economy," Rabbi Bielfeld said.

CACP's first major initiative, he said, resulted in 700 families putting their name on an ad that was published in the Globe and Mail.

"Our campaign has grown and we are poised to take off. We need the faith communities across Canada to urge [the government] to put its money where its mouth is. With your help, with your emunah, that day will come."

Gerald Vandezande, a volunteer spokesperson for the CACP, said, "We and the many members of our various faith communities know deep down what our respective faiths and fundamental values require all of us at this critical juncture in Canadian history regarding the obscenity of child and family poverty.

"We all know the shocking statistics which describe, time and again, the terrible tragedy that plagues so many neighbours in desperate need."

CACP is united, Vandezande said, to help bring about substantial changes in public awareness, public policies and government strategies... We want real changes that will end our country's massive child and family poverty."

A letter sent by CACP to the prime minister in December called for such initiatives as a social investment plan that re-directs at least 1.5 percent of the gross domestic product to federal investments in children and families; a comprehensive system of early childhood development services including affordable, high-quality care; and secure, affordable housing.

'Greatest 10 days of my life'

From the editor's desk

In this week's issue of The CJN, we publish a letter from a university student, Michael Tweyman, who has just returned from a short visit to Israel under the auspices of the Birthright Israel program.

The Birthright program, readers will recall, is a partnership of three funding bodies: a group of philanthropists led by Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, the UJA Federations across North America, and the government of Israel.

The program enables teenagers to "experience" Israel with their peers in an educational, group setting. Teenagers who have never been to Israel before in an organized tour are eligible to participate. The cost of the trip, including the substantial efforts related to pre-trip screening and post-trip follow-up, is underwritten for the participants by the program.

By all accounts, and to the surprise of some observers who were skeptical when the program was announced some three years ago, Birthright has been an extremely successful initiative.

"It creates an excitement," Zac Kaye, the head of Jewish Campus Services in Toronto, whose agency staff are part of the Birthright apparatus here and in Israel, told The CJN.

"A dynamic occurs that challenges the individuals' assumptions of who they are as young Jewish adults. The trip is a catalyst for some deep thinking about who they are and what they see for themselves in the future."

Kaye chose his words carefully, not wanting to overstate the long-range impact of the intense 10-day tour; but at the same time, not wanting to understate the clearly observable, immediately positive impact of the tour on the psyche and the emotions of the participants.

Tweyman's letter is eloquent testimony of that impact.

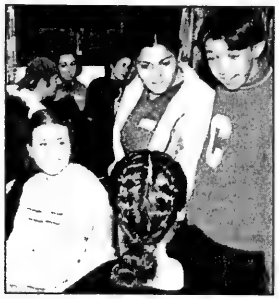
"I recently completed a Birthright Israel trip; it was the greatest 10 days of my life... To be at the Western Wall on Friday night, to be in the same auditorium in Jerusalem with 3,000 other Jews, to sing Hatikvah in Independence Hall in Tel Aviv were priceless moments and emotions that will remain concrete in my memory."

Ever inspirational and always poignant for its participants, the recent Birthright trip was even more so against the backdrop of the ongoing rejectionist intifadah.

Tourism to Israel, especially Jewish tourism from North America, has dropped to a trickle. The situation has scared away many Jews who might otherwise have travelled to Israel for vacation or other purposes.

The economic effect on Israel and on Israelis, whose income is tourism-dependent, has been dramatic. By far, however, the greatest effect on Israel has been psychological. The absence of Jewish tourists, especially, adds to the wearying and warying sense of isolation – this is not too strong a term – that the violence fosters among some Israelis.

Diaspora Jewry has expectations and even demands upon Israel that we are seldom reluctant to express, yet our avowed willingness to stand "shoulder to shoulder" with Israelis is apparently more rhetorical than real.



Birthright students meet young Israelis in Ophakim. [Israel photo]

For Canadian Jewry, there was an interesting sidebar to the recent Birthright trip. Some 500 students from the significant 4,000 strong American contingent changed their minds about participating. At the last moment, literally, program organizers made those spaces available to Canadians. In a matter of days, the spaces were filled.

This says a great deal about the sense of Jewish identity taking shape in our youth.

It also reinforces the wisdom of the historic Canadian communal approach to Jewish education. To infuse our children with the desire to follow in the long path of their people, there is no long term substitute for Jewish education in school and Jewish example in the home.

In February, a contingent of some 750 Canadian students will be travelling to Israel on the next Birthright wave. If the previous experiences of Birthright participants holds true for the February travellers, there is a strong chance that many of them, too, will be able to write that their visit was "the greatest 10 days" of their lives.

And if they do, we, their parents, should be grateful.

Not only does the trip help to germinate a sense of Jewishness in some of the students, where only a vague sense, if any at all exists, it also sends a powerful message to Israelis. For, in the words of our young letter writer, his visit was "extra special because of Israel's tough times right now."

Out of the Cold affirms dignity of homeless

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As usual on a winter Thursday evening, a small crowd of men, with a few women, gathers outside a side door of Holy Blossom Temple.

They sip coffee and wait patiently, in anticipation of the four-course meal that awaits them courtesy of the temple's Out of the Cold program, which provides a hot dinner, bagged lunch for the following day, a bus token, and for some, clothing, overnight shelter and a hot breakfast.

Holy Blossom, which first started hosting the program in 1996, was the first Jewish congregation to participate in Out of the Cold, a non-denominational coalition that thrives on volunteer leadership and the independent operations of each organization.

Since then three more Jewish congregations – Temple Har Zion, Beth Sholom and Beth Tzedec – have begun participating in the program, which began in 1987 when a small group of schools and churches set up a soup kitchen during the winter months.

There are now more than 50 religious and charitable organizations in the Toronto area involved in the program, which runs every night of the week.

Larry Babins, co-chair of Holy Blossom's program with Abe Neufeld, says that throughout the winter they rely on more than 450 volunteers – about 150 each week – to do such things as cook, make sandwiches, pick up donations, serve meals, socialize, provide entertainment and bring in clothing which is available to all guests.

Three shuls participate in program

Most evenings they have approximately 100 guests, about half of whom stay the night.

On this particular evening, about 85 people come for dinner, and 40 of them will stay the night, including one man who although he has a home, says he sometimes sleeps over because he "wants to socialize."

One volunteer says that attendance is a bit lower that evening because the welfare cheques had come out that week.

Babins and Neufeld, who are there every week, say that it is a "totally safe program that runs like a clock. There is security at all times, and there is no alcohol, drugs or tobacco allowed. A nurse is usually on hand and a social worker acts as a resource person to help guests access services they may need.

"Our mandate is to have a restful, peaceful safe environment. We do not judge anyone. If they bring in anything that is not allowed, we put it away and give it back to them when they leave. If they insist on keeping it, we move them out."

Meals, says Babins, are first class, and this night is no exception. Chef Sue Devor, who cooks for them three nights a month – the volunteer gourmet club cooks the fourth night – has prepared vegetable soup, baked cauliflower, roast chicken, poached salmon for those who do not eat meat and rhubarb crisp.

This was the first night of Chanukah so a group of volunteers had also fried huge batches of potato latkes, and Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, senior scholar of Holy Blossom, lit the menorah.

If some of the guests are Jewish, and usually there are some, says Neufeld, volunteers are available to say prayers. Once a month there is a d'var Torah. "The guests have a lot of respect for clergy, and often ask questions," says Babins.

Temple Har Zion, in its third winter as part of Out of the Cold, shares its time with the Jaffari Islamic Centre, located next door. Har Zion is running the programs on Wednesdays for the first half of the winter, and then the Islamic Centre takes over. A van picks up guests at the Finch Avenue subway station, and transports them to the temple in Thornhill.

Arieh Cohen, who initiated the interfaith Out of the Cold program in York Region – it also runs in several churches – says his temple can sleep 20, "but sometimes on a cold night we break the rules and add one or two more."

The main reason he got his congregation involved in Out of the Cold, says Cohen, is "not to give people a warm place to come, but to give them back the dignity they have lost. Society has spit them out, and when they come to us, they feel like rags.

"When they are treated as equals, they gradually retain their dignity. They begin to think that it is worth being a good citizen. We see changes in people. Those who would not talk to us, begin to look us in the eye and ask for advice. They feel some hope," he says.

Some former guests of the program are now employed by Out of the Cold, and some have been trained to be support people, he says.

Beth Sholom and Beth Tzedec, who together feed about 50 people and sleep 25 at Beth Sholom on Tuesday evenings, are running their program for the second year.

Karen Rosen, volunteer co-ordinator of the Beth Sholom program, says they got involved because "It is our obligation as members of the Jewish community to reach out to those who are less fortunate."

She estimates that about 10 percent of their guests are Jewish. "One guest came up to me and said that that he thinks he had gotten married at [Beth Sholom]. We really do have to remember that it could be us."

Participating in Out of the Cold, says Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom, "is the ultimate expression of gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness). We are recognizing that human life is potentially fragile and some of us could end up homeless.

"We do it as a sense of responsibility, not because we are patronizing people. We feel happy and privileged to have it here. The volunteers who help out without drawing attention to themselves are the real heroes," Rabbi Moscowitz says.

Cotler to meet Swedish PM on Wallenberg

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Montreal Liberal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler will hold talks next week with Sweden's prime minister on the fate of Swedish World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg.

Cotler, who headed an international commission of inquiry into the fate of Wallenberg in the early 1990s, will meet with Goran Persson in Stockholm Jan. 29.

Cotler, a recognized authority on human rights, is invited to address the Stockholm Forum on Intolerance, but will also exchange ideas with the prime minister on recent developments in the Wallenberg dossier.

Among them are the results of the joint Swedish-Russian commission into Wallenberg's fate. Earlier this month, the commission issued conflicting reports, after 10 years of investigations.

The Swedish report cited evidence that Wallenberg may have died as late as 1989 in a psychiatric clinic near Moscow. Sweden added that absent any hard evidence that Wallenberg is dead, he must be considered a missing person, and thus, possibly alive.

Irwin Cotler

"As long as there is no unequivocal evidence of what happened to Wallenberg – and this is still the case – it cannot be said that Raoul Wallenberg is dead," Persson was quoted by Reuters last week. If still alive, Wallenberg would be 88.

In the Russian version of the joint report, issued separately from the Swedish one, Wallenberg died in Soviet custody in 1947. Russian officials also advanced the theory that he was killed in a turf war between rival factions of the Soviet secret police.

A non-Jew and member of a wealthy industrialist family, Wallenberg was dispatched as a Swedish diplomat to Budapest in 1944. He issued thousands of fake Swedish passports to Jews, placed many of them in neutral safe houses and persuaded the Nazis to call off the razing of Budapest's Jewish ghetto.

In all, Wallenberg is credited with rescuing up to 100,000 Hungarian Jews from deportation – more than any single government.

But in 1945 he was arrested by the invading Soviets on espionage charges and taken to Moscow, where he vanished.

In a famous 1957 memo, the Soviets stated that Wallenberg had died of heart attack in 1947 while in custody. Moscow stuck to that story.

But Cotler and other researchers have found as many as a dozen credible witnesses who claimed to have had contact with Wallenberg in prison through the next four decades, and as late as 1989.

Wallenberg was named Canada's only honorary citizen in 1985. There are streets named for the hero in Toronto and Montreal.

Late last month, Russia acknowledged, for the first time, that Wallenberg and his driver were arrested as "socially dangerous" individuals and imprisoned for political reasons until their death in 1947.

The Russian prosector-general's office declared Wallenberg a "victim of Soviet repression," but failed to explain where, when or how he died.

As far as Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas is concerned, last month's statement was an attempt to "rehabilitate" Wallenberg.

"There was nothing new in that [statement]. It's simply an admission of a wrongful arrest, but not [an admission of] wrongful killing," said Matas, who conducted a lone investigation into Wallenberg's fate in 1996.

Sources in Moscow said the official rehabilitation of Wallenberg was initiated by President Vladimir Putin, who wants to close rifts with the west.

Cotler, too, found nothing new in the findings of the Russian commission into Wallenberg's fate.

He said statements by Russian official Alexander Yakovlev that Wallenberg was shot in Lubyanka prison in 1947 was the same thing Cotler was told, by Yakovlev, in 1991.

Raoul Wallenberg

"I can't put all that much credence in it. The [later] statement was pre-determined." Cotler told The CJN.

Cotler dismissed the Russian commission's findings, saying there is "incontrovertible" evidence that Wallenberg did not die in 1947.

"There is compelling evidence he was alive into the 1950s and credible evidence he was alive in the '70s and '80s."

The "smoking gun," he feels, lies in old KGB archives, which remain sealed.

"The one good and important thing that has come out of this," Cotler stated, "is that Sweden acknowledges this is still a mystery and that further inquiry is needed."

Community rally planned

TORONTO — A Community Rally for Jerusalem, featuring Israeli parliamentarian Natan Sharansky as keynote speaker, will be held on Tuesday, Jan. 30, at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto beginning at 8 p.m. The rally is being billed as a grassroots undertaking to demonstrate support for a united Jerusalem under Israeli control.

The rally is being organized by local community activists under the One Jerusalem umbrella (www.one jerusalem.org). One Jerusalem is an Israeli non-profit coalition dedicated to fighting the division of the capital. It is headed by Yechiel Leiter, a former spokesperson for the Council of Jewish Communities in Judea, Samaria and Gaza. One Jerusalem recently organized a 300,000-strong demonstration in Israel in support of a united Jerusalem.

Centre educates Japanese youth about Holocaust

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the last six months of 2000, an estimated 30,000 visitors toured the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre or viewed the exhibits and performances of the museum's travelling exhibitions. For many in Japan, the Resource Centre's educational projects present them with their first exposure to the history of the Holocaust and to the Jews' experience of destruction.

Japanese people in general, and youngsters in particular, are unfamiliar with this aspect of European history, said Fumiko Ishioka, director of the Resource Centre. In high school history textbooks, the Holocaust is given short shrift – perhaps a line or two – while "there was more focus on Japan as a victim. I learned a lot about Hiroshima."

"The general level of knowledge in Japan of the Holocaust is very low," Ishioka said.

Ishioka was in Toronto recently to interview Holocaust survivors saved by Japanese vice-consul Chiune Sugihara, who issued exit visas to hundreds of Lithuanian Jews. She also visited with Czechoslovakia-born survivor George Brady, who has been corresponding with Ishioka after learning his sister Hannah's suitcase, taken from her at Auschwitz, was being displayed at the Resource Centre (The CJN, Jan.4).

The suitcase, on loan from the Auschwitz museum, has proven an effective tool in helping young Japanese children identify with a typical Holocaust victim. Young people are especially drawn to it because it belonged to a teenaged girl who was killed only because she was Jewish. Ishioka said the suitcase is a valuable tool in the centre's efforts to sensitize young people to the Holocaust and draw universal lessons about intolerance and hate.

When the centre acquired the suitcase, Ishioka had no idea anyone from Hannah's family had survived. Through a remarkable series of coincidences, she learned Brady was alive and last summer they began to exchange letters.

"When the children learned he was still alive, they were so excited," Ishioka said. They were doubly excited when Brady sent them photographs of Hannah, allowing them to put a face to the name they'd come to know.

"They were interested to learn her brother had survived. I showed them a picture of George and his family and his daughter, who is named for Hannah, and his grandchildren. It was important for them to know that he had built a life," Ishioka said.

Knowledge of the Holocaust is quite sketchy in Japan, Ishioka said. Although The Diary of Anne Frank is a best-seller, it is "seen as a general symbol of war victims." Most Japanese don't realize that Frank was Jewish, she said.

A local businessman launched the Resource Centre in 1997 with the goal of educating the public about the Holocaust. The businessman, who wishes to remain anonymous, has never travelled outside Japan and has no links to Jewish friends or business associates.

"He says it's important in the coming 21st century and important for children to know that lots of children were killed for just being born Jewish," Ishioka said.

Located in the heart of Tokyo, the centre operates on an annual budget of 12 million yen (about $152,000). The facility itself is tiny – only a few hundred square feet – but it contains a library equipped with videos, books, maps and wartime artifacts.

"Teachers who find it important bring their students, and mothers do too," Ishioka said.

A much larger Holocaust museum, established in 1990, is located in Hiroshima. Run by Rev. Makoto Otsuka, it is supported by the Japanese Christian Friends of Israel.

"People in Hiroshima are very conscious of peace issues," Ishioka said. "What we have in Tokyo is so different. It's so difficult to reach people. There are so many things going on. People have so many things to do. They don't want to look at this tragedy. But we really want to focus on what happened to children at the time."

The centre's homepage can be found at www.ne.jp/asahi/holocaust/tokyo.

Please see Rabbi Plaut's column on page 10.

Saddam menaces again

Last week, Saddam Hussein commemorated the 10th anniversary of the "Mother of all Battles," as he still refers to the Gulf War, perhaps in tender filial appreciation for his own mother, by remonstrating against the United States and Israel.

Standing secure in the balcony of the lookout from which he proudly reviewed his troops and the deadly military hardware under his sole control, Saddam at one point became so wrapped up in the festivities that he fired off volley after volley of an automatic machine gun into the air. To dispel the unpleasant rumours about his ill health and failing strength, he made certain the cameras recorded the moment. Smiling throughout, he needed only one hand to hold aloft the substantial weapon as it staccatoed its angry fire into the sky.

Saddam scoffed at the incoming American administration and praised his own people for having resisted so valiantly the "devil and his emissaries."

Not surprisingly, however, the president's greatest delight seemed to derive from his exhortations to his people and to the Muslim world, to destroy Israel. In a television interview, he called for the establishment of a "Palestine from the river to the sea." He urged the governments of Syria and Jordan to allow the Iraqi army to pass through Syrian and Jordanian territory on its way to Israel.

Joining the Iraqi celebrations earlier in the week had been Farouk Kadoumi, the head of the PLO's political department. Saddam pledged his full support to the cause of his Palestinian guest. There was no record of Kadoumi politely suggesting to his host that the Palestinians were resolved to settle their differences with Israel by negotiations.

Ten years after he set the Persian Gulf ablaze with his maniacal lust for power and recognition, Saddam still sits comfortably atop his dictatorial perch. He has murdered his enemies and has very little, if any, regard for the suffering of his own people, other than for its powerful propaganda value.

In the west, remarkably, Saddam still has his apologists. Some even travelled to Iraq last week. They rightly bemoan the misery of the Iraqi people but refuse to blame him for his people's impoverished, painful condition. Nor do they upbraid the Iraqi president for his plain-spoken determination to destroy Israel. Did they ever?

When the Iraqi Scuds fell from the night sky onto the civilian population of Israel more than 40 times some 10 years ago, Saddam's western apologists, even then, were reluctant to withhold their apologies.

Ten years after his "mother of all battles," Saddam's singular passion for the destruction of Israel persists. It should not be discounted as the mere posturing of a far-away tyrant. Western countries, including Canada, should make clear to him, they will not.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Levant replies to Csillag

In the Dec. 21, 2000 issue of The CJN, columnist Ron Csillag attacked the National Post, Conrad Black and me for being "biased" because we are "in favour of Israel." The Post and Mr. Black can take care of themselves, but I would like to respond on my own behalf.

If exposing Canada's anti-Israel votes at the United Nations – after Jean Chrétien promised he would be balanced and fair – is "biased," then I plead guilty. I would have expected such an accusation from a Palestinian newspaper, not from The CJN, which seeks to be the paper of record for Canadian Jewry.

I don't know why Mr. Csillag felt the need to dedicate so much ink to running down Israel's supporters in the media – he has yet to turn his critical eye towards the Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star and the CBC for their anti-Israel coverage. But that is an issue between Mr. Csillag and his readers. Just don't try to bring the rest of us down for standing by Israel in its hour of need.

Lanzmann replies to Kirshner

In your issue of Nov. 9, 2000, you published an interview of me by Sheldon Kirshner. His questions and my answers are suppressed and I don't recognize what it was I said to him nor the substance of my thoughts in the strange summary mixture he wrote for your readers.

In that article, I appear as a kind of Jewish fascist, speaking like a hurried and dry journalist. Apparently, Mr. Kirshner did not see my films, did not read my books and is completely ignorant of my personality and of my whole life project.

Claude Lanzmann
Paris, France

(Editor's note: The CJN is satisfied that Kirshner reported accurately and asked straightforward questions about the main subject at hand, the intifidah. Kirshner has interviewed Lanzmann twice in the past six years and has seen three of his films, including Shoah. He is hardly ignorant of Lanzmann's personality or his life project.)

Elder Abuse Programs ongoing

An article in The CJN, Jan. 4 titled "Program launched to combat abuse of older women" may have left a misunderstanding about our elder abuse programs.

I would like to assure your readers that the awareness project on abuse of the elderly, individual and group counselling at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living are ongoing.

No danger on Birthright trip

I recently completed a Birthright Israel trip; it was the greatest 10 days of my life. I know many parents and kids are afraid of Israel right now, but I did not feel endangered at any point on the trip.

The danger is not non-existent, but Israelis go on living their lives and Israel is still a very safe place to be, especially with a tour. The Birthright organizers took every precaution to ensure our security. To see the looks of appreciation from Israelis and to feel the the sense of satisfaction that we were doing something extremely important, though little, left a feeling I cannot describe.

To be at the Western Wall on Friday night, to be in the same auditorium in Jerusalem with 3,000 other Jews, to sing Hatikvah in Independence Hall in Tel Aviv were priceless moments and emotions that will remain concrete in my memory. They were extra special because of Israel's tough times right now.

I challenge you not to believe what you read or see in the general media, and to personally investigate what is going on in Israel.

Israel needs our tourism

I have just returned from Israel after being there for a couple of weeks on my winter break. I'm extremely pleased that I made the decision to go.

We cannot give in to a small group of terrorists who are trying to deter us from visiting our beloved country and from helping to strengthen it with our presence.

A visit to Israel is good not only for its economy, but also for the morale and soul of the people who live there. Think about what a mitzvah you can do by letting others know that you have come to support them. Everyone I visited was so happy that I was there; strangers I met were grateful that I came for a visit at this difficult time.

I wasn't constantly thinking about the violence. There are so many positive things happening in the country at any given moment and many wonderful and talented people who help to distract you from the political developments.

Israel cannot survive without tourism. Think about what a real contribution you can make by being there for two or three weeks.

I look forward to visiting again, God willing, in the summer.

Jerusalem's holiness a recent phenomenon for Muslims

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

An abridged version of this essay appeared in The CJN three years ago. In light of recent events, the author expanded upon her original essay. This is the second part of the two-part article. Part 1 appeared last week.

A simple but important military detail exemplifies the lack of religious and spiritual importance that Muslims traditionally attached to Jerusalem. Having just conquered Syria in the year 638, Omar, the second caliph, did not deem Jerusalem worthy of his efforts and decided not to populate it with Muslims. A Judeo-Arabic letter found in the Cairo Geniza informs us that when the Jews asked Omar for permission to return to Jerusalem, he granted it to them, despite his promise to the Christians not to allow Jews to live there.

In the same vein, Omar built only a modest wooden mosque on the Temple compound, judging that was all Jerusalem deserved. Centuries later, in 1229, al-Malik-al-Kamil, sultan of Egypt was prepared to give Jerusalem to the emperor, Frederick III.

Despite its name, the Mosque of Omar was not built by Omar, but by Abd el-Malik who, 50 years after Omar, wished to outdo the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and to get even with his rival, the caliph of Mecca and Medina, who was constantly challenging his authority. Mecca and Medina had a tremendous religious and political attraction which provided huge revenues from the pilgrims.

To counterbalance this enormous advantage, Abd el-Malik trumpeted the holiness of Jerusalem, in the hope of attracting pilgrims. He built the mosque on the Temple Mount, on the rock where Abraham had planned to sacrifice Isaac and where the Ark of Temple later rested. His message was that this dome was the shrine of the final Divine Word, namely that the new temple was dedicated to the true religion of Abraham, replacing the Temple of Solomon, continuing the revelations entrusted to the Jews and Christians and correcting their blasphemous falsifications.

The political and religious purpose of the shrine was to show that a new universal state and a new world religion had arisen to challenge the pretensions of the Byzantine Empire and the Christian doctrine. This was emphasized by the choice of koranic verses and other inscriptions that grace the interior of the mosque and proclaim the greatness of God "the Mighty, the Wise" and declare that "God and His angels bless the Prophet," and call upon Christians to recognize Jesus as an apostle of God, His word and spirit, but not His son.

One verse occurs repeatedly: "There is no God but God alone. He is God, one, eternal; He does not beget nor is He begotten... God's religion is Islam."

As for the Jews, they needed no such written message in the minds of the Muslims, since the fact that the Dome of the Rock was now standing where the Holy Temple once stood, clearly meant that Islam was to replace Judaism and that God was now sending his true prophet, Mohammed, to spread the true faith, Islam.

Malik's son, Caliph Waleed, built Al-Aksa, a mosque with a silver dome, which, with the adjoining Dome of the Rock, is the first great religious building complex in the history of Islam. The Muslims call the Temple Mount esplanade Haram al-Sharif: Noble sanctuary.

Despite these mosques and their religious symbolism, Jerusalem did not instantly become a holy city for the Muslims, the way it did for the Jews as soon as King David brought to it the Ark of Law. This might be due to the fact that, since the earliest times of Islam and traditionally ever since, the Muslims have not only denied any Jewish or Christian influence in the formation and crystallization of their religious doctrine, but they have also often made a strong point of distancing themselves from most Jewish or Christian symbols. One such symbol is Jerusalem, and, as the famous Princeton scholar Bernard Lewis put it: "To venerate Jerusalem as a holy city is a sign of Jewish influence and therefore bad."

Mohammed and the first Muslims used to face Jerusalem when praying, fasted on Yom Kippur, observed Shabbat and followed the same dietary laws as the Jews. But, when the Jews refused to convert, Mohammed modified the dietary laws, made Friday the weekly religious holiday, declared Ramadan a month of fast, and ordered his followers to turn towards Mecca five times a day for prayer.

Ever since, Islam has revered Mecca, where the prophet was born around 570, and Medina, where he died in 632. Later, the Almohads added yet another holy Muslim city, Kairawan in Tunisia, and they forbade Jews and Christians to live in it, so as not to desecrate it with their impure presence. Similarly, not only was Jerusalem not a holy city for Muslims, but its special place in the hearts and religious writings of the Jews made it quite unholy to them.

For many theologians, to sanctify Jerusalem is yet another trick from Jewish converts to Islam, to include some Jewish beliefs or rituals, thus Judaizing Islam.

This attitude changed and the issue of the sanctity of Jerusalem arose and went on for centuries. It has finally been settled in favour of sanctity, but only relatively recently. In November 1851, a British consul, James Finn, reported to London that: "Muslim veneration for the Holy City is a non-entity except within the precincts of the great mosque."

One of the reasons might be that during the Crusades, the Muslims lost Jerusalem and subsequently reconquered it. They could not help noticing the importance it had for the Christians. Similarly, the rivalries between the European powers who fought bitterly for the control of the holy sites towards the end of the Ottoman Empire made the city more and more desirable to the Muslims. Another reason might be found in this verse of the Koran, Chapter 17, The Night Journey:

"Glory be to Him who made His servant go by night from the Sacred Temple to the farther Temple whose surroundings We have blessed, that We might show him some of Our signs."

In my Penguin Classics English translation of the Koran, the Sacred Temple means "Of Mecca" and the Temple translates to: "Of Jerusalem (and thence to the throne of Allah, accompanied by the Angel Gabriel). Some Muslim commentators give a literal interpretation to this passage, others regard it as a vision."

Thus, Jerusalem is actually never explicitly mentioned in the Koran and when it is mentioned at all in early Muslim writings, it is called Aelia. Moreover, because the Dome of the Rock was built on the ruins of the Temple, it evoked Solomon's Temple for the Muslims, who consequently invested Jerusalem with a certain degree of holiness and called it Bayt ha-Miqdash, or Al-Quds, the [city of] holiness.

Despite these reasons, which explain why Jerusalem came to be important for Muslims, it never became a centre of Islamic studies, and the Muslims themselves believe in the Jews' right over the city, as do some famous political figures. For example, during his Egyptian and Palestinian campaign in 1799, Napoleon issued a proclamation inviting the Jews to "come and settle Jerusalem," and in his novel, Tancred, Benjamin Disraeli wrote about "those days of political justice when Jerusalem belonged to the Jews."

Also, Tabari, the famous ninth-century Muslim historian gives the following account of a conversation between Kab al-Ahbar, a Jew converted to Islam and the caliph Omar, shortly after the conquest of Jerusalem:

Omar: Where do you think we should put our place of prayer?

Kab: By the Rock.

O.: By God, Kab, you are following after Judaism. I saw you take off your sandals.

K.: I wanted to feel the touch of it with my bare feet.

O.: I saw you. But no... we were not commanded concerning the Rock, but we were commanded concerning the Kaba [in Mecca].

This conversation shows how skeptical Omar was of Kab's conversion to Islam since Kab still held Jerusalem holy. As well, when he first saw the site of the Temple, which had become a garbage dump, Omar reportedly ordered the Byzantine patriarch to crawl on his hands and knees through the filth and "clean this Jewish holy place."

The behaviour of Omar and a few of the subsequent Muslim rulers shows that not only was Islam free of any special attachment to Jerusalem, but it actually acknowledged the Jews' "ownership" and rights over it. For example, in Mamluk Egypt, the oath concerning the Jews included this sentence: "May I join Nebuchadnezzar in the destruction of Jerusalem and the slaughter of the Israelites;" and the charge of appointment for a Jewish Nagid included this one: "The Nagid must pray towards Jerusalem which is their qibla and the holy place of their faith."

The Muslims have traditionally had a special reverence for the Temple, because it was the first temple they had seen of a religion that did not use drawings, statues and sculptures to "represent the Unrepresentable." Many believe in the legend that explains why the Dome of the Rock is black. The holy colour of Islam is green and the Dome of the Rock was originally green. But it gradually began to tarnish and eventually became completely black. Many Muslim theologians interpreted this as a sign of mourning for the destruction of the Temple that had stood there before the Dome of the Rock was built on the holy spot.

However significant the tie between Islam and Jerusalem, it is a relatively recent one, and as we have seen, far less theologically centred than is often assumed.

As many as 300,000 Israelis marched around the walls of the Old City two weeks ago, to oppose a divided sovereignty of the city. The sign projected on the ancient wall proclaims "loyalty" to the city.

Even in Japan

Back in the days of World War II, Japan was allied with Nazi Germany and introduced into its school curricula some of the anti-Semitic bias propagated by its wartime partner. One of the problems was that there were hardly any Jews living in Japan, and the average Japanese could not, therefore, relate to the message the Nazis tried to sell. Now, over 50 years later, a different piece of news came to me from Tokyo: the opening of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Centre (THERC) at the end of 1998.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

How did this come to pass? I will let the director of the centre, Fumiko Ishioka, speak for herself:

"One of the concerns that led to the opening of THERC was the fact that few children have a chance to learn about the history of the Holocaust at school. While Anne Frank's diary has been widely read... since it was published in this country in 1952, [Frank] has rather been seen as a symbol of general war victims for many Japanese. Few understand that Anne Frank was discriminated against and persecuted, along with one and a half million other children, for no other reason than she was born Jewish.

"The Holocaust, the systematic annihilation of the Jews based on distorted racial ideology, has universal lessons, which must be understood and told from generation to generation throughout the world. It does not matter where you live, what your nationality is, or what your religion is. As one of the great tragedies in the entire human history, in which a number of young children were killed, it is our responsibility as Japanese as well to remember the Holocaust and let our next generation learn from it so that it will never happen again. Learning about the Holocaust, furthermore, gives children in Japan a unique opportunity to think about what each one of them can do to fight against discrimination and intolerance that cause bullying and violence at school. They will also learn to open their eyes to the world to think about what they can do to create peace toward the 21st century.

"THERC started with about 300 Japanese and 200 English books on the Holocaust, including children's picture books, diaries, photo books, dictionaries and 50 videos, many of which have been kindly donated by individuals and organizations around the world. We aimed at creating such an atmosphere that any children could freely come in to learn about the Holocaust and share their ideas on something they can start doing now on their own to create peace."

Several generations after the Holocaust, the Japanese have come full circle and are making their contribution to an understanding of the very nadir of civilization.

The past is where the future is

A useable past: that's what every nation searches for, what every individual wants to feel proud of. Some years ago, Israel produced a poster with a test-tube nestled inside an ancient pot, calling for people to come to Israel because, it asserted, "Your past is where your future is."

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

That useable past is usually, if not always, constructed out of selected memories. These remembrances of events and people past are never complete – who, after all, can render complete truth about every past event in the human chain?

Sometimes this useable past is so distorted that anyone standing apart from the events sees the errors hidden from those inside.

Austria, for example, has long portrayed itself as a victim of Nazi occupation, yet a look at that country's welcome of Hitler (captured nicely on film) and its subsequent enthusiasm for the Third Reich (not to mention Kurt Waldheim) reveals quite another past, one much uglier than Austria wishes to acknowledge.

The current Canadian TV series, "A People's History," is grappling with some of the complexities of white contact with the original inhabitants of this country, and with those First Nations' complicated web of relationships. The series has just embarked on the delicate task of elucidating French-English relationships and histories, an enterprise fraught with tension and differing interpretations of the same events. The point is not whether this series is getting to the truth of our history, but whether it is provoking passionate discussion of our past, and how we will create our nation's future out of that past.

Which brings me back to the poster. In Twentieth Century: A History of the World 1901 to the Present, J.M. Roberts writes: "There are few moments in the twentieth-century so sodden with history as the establishment of Israel." He could have added, "and few events so drenched in history as the creation of a Palestinian state."

Israelis and Palestinians (and their respective supporters abroad) shout across battle lines that are drawn not just on the ground, but also from clashing histories that seem to be irreconcilable. Abba Eban said, "The Palestinians never miss an opportunity to miss an opportunity." Their recent outburst, with a leadership unable to compromise at all and probably unable to govern so unruly and fractious a population (thus giving in to the most extreme elements at every turn) comes from reading a history book that allows for no compromises. That history book is written from a victim's point of view and with revenge as its subtext, revenge for true wrongs as well as imagined ones. Unaware of the changes both in Israeli society and in other Arab states' perceptions of history and future, they risk sinking deeper into despair, poverty and continued violence, both internally and against their blood enemy, the State of Israel. Their useable past, constructed out of blood, promises a dismal future for their children.

And Israel? Some people in the country are also reading history books written in blood, with geographies that defy present circumstances and a realistic future. Israel, too, is frustrated that its seemingly reasonable gestures have been answered with anger and rejection, and so is poised to take a national referendum, through the upcoming election, on its own future.

Each nation has a useable past. Each runs the risk of taking the worst, most distorted elements from that past and creating a future of misunderstanding, violence and hatred. Another wise man, Penn State football coach Joe Paterno, always cautioned his team: "Don't play with blood in your eyes."

After all, the past can start today – it doesn't have to be based on the hurts, real and imagined or the geographies of the most extreme.

I hope that the solution for both nations can be based on a mutually agreed future. But it better start soon.

Volunteers make shul a success

As regular readers of this column are aware, I grew up in that mecca of Judaism, Sydney, N.S. After Grade 11, I left to go to university, or rather universities – McGill, Dalhousie, Harvard. I subsequently settled in Edmonton.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

I spent a lot of time during those years looking for a shul like Temple Sons of Israel in Sydney – a synagogue which had the right mix of theology (non-egalitarian Conservative), community (the shul was the centre of it), and participation (congregants, particularly the youth, were allowed to do everything). Somehow, I never really found just the right place.

In 1988-89, my family and I went on our first sabbatical to Israel. I assumed I would be able to find a shul in Jerusalem that had all of the characteristics that I loved about my shul in Sydney. I became a "shul hopper," a "theological voyeur." But I had no luck here either. I did realize that I could daven almost anywhere – in any synagogue or in no synagogue at all. But the last six months – being away from my family, my friends and my synagogue – have been difficult, both personally and religiously.

This was brought home to me recently, when I was home in Edmonton for Chanukah. It was, of course, terrific to be with my family and friends who I miss dearly. It was also very heartwarming to be back again in my own synagogue – Congregation Beth Shalom. I was struck by what an amazing congregation Beth Shalom really is! For the past five years, Beth Shalom has been without a resident rabbi or cantor. And yet, the congregation continues to grow and prosper. As I understand it, membership numbers are up; attendance at tfillot is up; there is a minyan every morning; there is a vibrant junior congregation; the Shabbat afternoon Minchah-seudah-Ma'ariv service is particularly lively, enthusiastic and well-attended; there is learning going on with classes on Pirkei Avot (Ethics of our Ancestors) and the parshat hashavuah (weekly Torah portion); there is an active social justice (tikkun olam) program and an extremely vibrant women's league.

What accounts for this success? (I note parenthetically that I am not a subscriber to that axiom of synagogue politics: No rabbi plus no cantor equals no problems.) Although ritual director Neil Loomer does an excellent job, for Beth Shalom, the key to success is obvious – an incredibly dedicated group of volunteers on both the board and the ritual committee.

This was brought home to me quite clearly over the Chanukah vacation. On Shabbat Chanukah, the president sponsors a kiddush honouring past presidents of the congregation, acknowledging the indebtedness of the shul to these volunteers who gave up their time to lead the congregation. Many past presidents attend and help lead the davening. This year our president, Mila Plots, davened the entire Musaf service!

It was a wonderful Shabbat service. However, it was also tinged with sadness as the congregation had just lost one its past presidents and strongest supporters, Larry Rollingher, z"l. Larry had been involved with, and the president or chair of, virtually every organization in the community, but his heart lay at Beth Shalom. For a generation of community leaders, Larry set the standard to which we all aspired. He will be sorely missed in Edmonton and at Beth Shalom.

On a much less somber note, during the same Shabbat, it was announced that the congregation would be honouring two of its most dedicated and respected volunteers – Russ Joseph and Jerry Katz – at a tribute dinner to be held on April 1. I should disclose that Jerry and Russ are two of my closest friends. Jerry is Beth Shalom's head Torah reader and shofar blower and is the person in the congregation who announces Rosh Chodesh (the new month). He also works magic with the children and teens who attend our Junior congregation.

Russ has been a member of the board of the congregation for over 20 years, and served a number of years as the vice-president of finance, as well as a term as president.

There are no more worthy honorees than Russ and Jerry and I look forward to returning to Edmonton for the dinner. The congregation, due to happenstance or mischance, never honoured Larry Rollingher in this way. He would have loved to have been at this evening honouring Russ and Jerry and I know that on the evening of April 1, Jerry and Russ and all of us who have been volunteers in the Edmonton community, will spend a few moments thinking about Larry and thanking him for the significant work he did on behalf of all of us in Edmonton.

It is volunteers, like Larry, Russ, and Jerry, who make the shul a success!

The Kirshner File

Sharon reconfigures himself as a moderate

Judging by recent public opinion surveys, Ariel Sharon is on the cusp of fulfilling his most cherished ambition: Israel's prime ministership. Surveys conducted by two Israeli dailies, Maariv and Yediot Ahronot, show that Sharon, Likud's standard-bearer, will beat Ehud Barak, the Labor party incumbent, by a huge margin in the Feb. 6 election, a referendum of the Oslo peace process.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Sharon can thank four men for his massive lead in the polls: Barak, who failed to bring peace to Israel despite indefatigable efforts; Benjamin Netanyahu, the former prime minister who petulantly dropped out of the Likud leadership race after failing to enlist Knesset support for a general election; Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian Authority president who rejected a fairly generous Israeli peace plan at Camp David and then initiated a Palestinian uprising; and Hafez al-Assad, the late Syrian strongman who squandered an opportunity to regain all but a sliver of the Golan Heights.

In short, Sharon, 72, would not be riding as high today had Barak managed to sign historic agreements with the Palestinian Authority and with Syria, and had Netanyahu swallowed his pride and chosen to contest the special election called by Barak.

With the election less than two weeks away, Sharon, a polarizing figure, is downplaying his hawkish image and toning down his rhetoric in a bid to win over middle-of-the-road voters who will essentially decide its outcome. Campaigning as a moderate, much to the chagrin of some of his fervent right-wing supporters, he is directing his appeal to centrists who want peace, but not at any price.

Newly repackaged as a kinder, gentler politician, Sharon is running on the slick slogan of "Only Sharon Can Bring Peace," a theme his critics deride as an exercise in cynical manipulation. They have a point. Sharon has gone on record as saying he will not honour any agreements entered into by Barak. He has declared the Oslo accords to be null and void. He has said that concessions "will only bring us closer to war."

Sharon, nevertheless, is presented himself as a champion of peace. "I am a moderate, you know," he said. "We all want to avoid war and are all committed to peace."

And in an attempt to sell himself as a statesman rather than a warrior, Sharon has struck a cautionary note. He urged Jewish settlers in the West Bank not to take the law into their own hands after the roadside killing of Binyamin Kahane and his wife, and he urged his followers to refrain from branding Barak as a traitor.

Friends claim that Sharon, an ex-general who has served four prime ministers in a variety of important cabinet posts, is a pragmatist, not an ideologue. To some degree, this is true.

In 1977, three years after winning a Knesset seat, Sharon formed his own political party, Shlomzion, sought support from the left and voiced a willingness to negotiate with the PLO when it was still banned and demonized in Israel as a terrorist organization.

Five years later, when Israel and Egypt were struggling to cap a deal on the Sinai Peninsula, Sharon tipped the balance by agreeing to vacate the showpiece settlement of Yamit.

In 1998, when Netanyahu and Arafat were trying to seal the Wye accord, Sharon made it possible by dropping his objection to a further 13 percent Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank. He had previously claimed that Israel, in the interests of its security, could not afford a pullback of more than nine percent.

When it comes to territorial compromise, Sharon has clearly mellowed. In a 1991 interview with The Jerusalem Report, he said, "We do not trade land for peace." But after much personal agonizing, he grudgingly embraced that premise, enshrined in United Nations Resolution 242 – the cornerstone of all Mideast diplomacy since the Six Day War – and in the Oslo accords.

Sharon, who once offered the Arabs "peace for peace," and therefore nothing, claims that he is ready to make "painful, far-reaching concessions" for the sake of reaching an agreement with the Palestinians. But he has been woefully short on details.

Until quite recently, he held that the Palestinians were not entitled to statehood, since they supposedly already had a state in Jordan, arbitrarily severed from Palestine by the British in 1922. Of late, Sharon has been saying that Palestinian statehood in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip is inevitable. His idea of a Palestinian state, truncated and disconnected, would not be acceptable to the current Palestinian leadership.

As for southern Lebanon, Sharon opposed a unilateral withdrawal from Israel's self-declared security zone there until about 1997. He changed his view with the realization that Lebanon was a morass sucking the lifeblood out of Israel.

For all his policy flip-flops and appeals to the centre, Sharon essentially remains a hawk – a wolf in sheep's clothing – by contemporary Israeli standards. Some examples:

As Begin's first minister of agriculture, in charge of settling the disputed territories, Sharon aggressively created "facts on the ground," launching a massive building program that more than doubled the number of Israeli settlements and roads beyond the Green Line. Establishing outposts not only in militarily strategic areas, but in heavily-populated Arab localities, Sharon cut the West Bank into a patchwork of Jewish and Palestinian archipelagos dominated by Israel. As minister of housing and construction, he pressed this agenda with renewed vigour.

Sharon planned and implemented Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, an operation that routed the PLO from its Lebanese bases but gave rise to the Hezbollah, an equally grave threat. Sharon misled Begin by taking this "war of choice" past the agreed upon 40-kilometre mark, engaging Syria and occupying West Beirut. Israel's Lebanese Christian ally, the Phalange, slaughtered hundreds of Palestinian civilians in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps. The 1983 Kahane Commission found Sharon indirectly responsible for the massacre, and he resigned in disgrace.

Ariel Sharon

In 1998, after replacing the mercurial David Levy as foreign minister, Sharon declined to shake hands with Arafat at the Wye summit, a refusal inconsistent with his diplomatic duties. By way of justifying his position, he said he would shake hands with Arafat only after Israel and the Palestinian Authority were at peace. With the Wye agreement signed, Sharon deliberately sabotaged it by urging Jewish zealots to seize hillsides and build encampments in the West Bank. They heeded his advice, building 42 makeshift settlements that complicated Israel's ongoing negotiations with the Palestinians.

Sharon also demonstrated his bent for hardline politics by criticizing Barak's handling of talks with Syria. Israel, he declared, "must keep the Golan Heights."

Shortly after Netanyahu lost the 1999 election to Barak, Sharon won the leadership of the Likud, turning aside challenges from Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem, and Meir Shetreet, the former finance minister. Though he gradually repositioned himself as a moderate, Sharon revealed his true colours by attacking Barak's Camp David summit concessions, by dismissing President Bill Clinton's subsequent peace proposals and by visiting the Temple Mount last September.

With his provocative visit to the Temple Mount, designed mainly to bolster his right-wing credentials, Sharon touched off the second Palestinian intifadah. He said he had a right to be there.

"Jews do indeed have the right to go anywhere," Leonard Fein, a Jewish columnist, later wrote. "But Judaism is at least as much about responsibilities as it is about rights. Wise Jews know that there are times when it is best not to exercise a particular right..."

Although Sharon and Barak both vigorously oppose Arafat's demand on the "right of return" of Arab refugees to Israel, they part company on all other issues.

Barak wants a comprehensive agreement, while Sharon seeks long-term interim arrangements based on Palestinian non-belligerency. Barak is willing to share East Jerusalem. Sharon rejects that notion.

Sharon opposes the dismantling of Israeli settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, while Barak would relinquish some, if not many. Sharon would keep the Jordan Valley. Barak would settle for Israeli listening posts there. Barak would give up more than 90 percent of the West Bank and all of Gaza. Sharon would retain as much as 50 percent of the West Bank and segments of Gaza. Sharon would divide a Palestinian state into a Swiss cheese maze of cantons. Barak might accept a reasonably contiguous state.

The Palestinians, having turned down a much more generous package from Barak, would not even consider Sharon's formulas. If anything, they will spell finis to an already battered peace process, jeopardize Israel's tenuous ties with the Palestinians, Egypt and Jordan and destabilize the Mideast.

Jewish Life

The exemplary Jew

The Jewish Moral Virtues*, by Eugene B. Borowitz, Frances W. Schwartz Jewish Publication Society, 1999, $38.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

What is musar? This Hebrew term refers to ethical instruction or wisdom and how it may be applied to contemporary life and problems. Musar is derived from many sources: the Hebrew Scriptures, rabbinic literature, medieval philosophy, Chassidism, Yiddish and Ladino folklore and Proverbs.

The most famous exponent of musar as a vital and enlivening movement was Rabbi Israel Salanter of the 19th century. His aim was to promote greater inwardness, religious piety and ethical commitment among his traditionally minded followers.

The Jewish Moral Virtues is loosely based on a 13th-century work by the Roman Scholar Yehiel ben Binyamin. It is a unique anthology that discusses the character traits and attributes of the exemplary Jew.

Over a seven-year period, Schwartz and Rabbi Borowitz studied this medieval text with rabbinical students to determine how the 24 major virtues it exalted – among them, generosity, modesty, peace, repentance, prayer, humility and wealth – could best be understood in modern terms.

The result is a helpful and relevant guide that synthesizes traditional scholarship with a wide range of Jewish sources, ancient and modern. It is, in effect, a manual of ethics that speaks to all persons, religious or secular.

Rabbi Borowitz is convinced that insofar as we infuse our everyday affairs with Jewish values, we add our own insights to the unbroken chain of musar.

"Again and again we realized that some truths about human nature do not change; people today have pretty much the same aspirations and failings as they did seven centuries ago in Yehiel's time, or even in the days of the Bible and Talmud," Rabbi Borowitz writes. "The deep human insight of Jews who lived millennia ago in circumstances so different from our own is often breathtaking."

The following are two typical selections from the book.

• "Why are the fingers tapered like pegs? So that if one hears anything improper, we can insert them in our ears" (Ketubot, 5b). "R. Joshua b. Levi said: 'We should never let an unseemly expression fall from our mouths'" (Pesachim, 3a). "Knowing the damage the tongue can do, R. Joseph b. Zimra said that God tried to restrain it: 'All the limbs of the human body are vertical, but I made you horizontal; all of them I put outside the body, but you I put inside; and I have even surrounded you with two walls, one of bone and one of flesh'" (Arla, 15b).

• "Talk of rewards we are to receive both in this world and the next does not seem high-minded enough for some of our teachers. If Torah is so wondrous a gift, then we should pursue it simply to fill our lives with its words and sacred meaning: Do not say, 'I will read the Bible that I may be called a sage; I will investigate the traditions that I may be called a rabbi; I will study that I may be called an elder and sit in the assembly of elders,' but study out of love and let what honours come as may… R. Eliezer b. R. Zadok said: 'Do good deeds because of your regard for their Commander and study the words of Torah for their own sake. Do not use them as a crown to magnify yourself with, or as a spade to hoe with'" (Nedarim 62a).

Learning from the past

Guest voice

By BEN ARCHIBALD

I am somewhat troubled and worried. The lessons of our recent past are not being learned.

The one great advantage of the Oslo process was the evolution of our ability to criticize and examine many of the assumptions and motivations underlying the Zionist enterprise. Although the soul searching exposed deep divisions between left and right and Israeli and Diaspora Jews, we all began to assess our positions with more care.

Yet despite the very real failures of the recent Barak/Clinton peace initiative and my own misgivings about the concessions made, I am troubled by murmurings I hear on campus, in the synagogue and during conversations with friends in Israel. The nub of those murmurings is along the lines of "Barak is a traitor," "Barak is mentally ill," "Barak is not a Zionist," etc.

Though I believe little in Martin Buber's Zionist ideas, his concept of "I and Thou, Otherness and dialogue promote a deeper understanding of the self" rings louder in my ears by the day. Buber was deeply concerned that a political state and the art of statecraft would undermine Jewish morality. The language I am hearing validates that concern.

If I had the privilege to vote, Barak would not have earned my trust due to his poor approach to governance policy and, ironically, diplomacy. Yet I would cast my vote without denigrating him or those with similar views.

Recently, when I spoke admiringly of Avraham Burg and how his father, Rav. Yosef Burg is looking down on him with great pride – a Zionist son seeking to act honourably at a difficult time in our history – I was told that Burg was not a Zionist and was contributing to the destruction of Israel!

I do not share Avraham Burg's views, but I recognize without hesitation that he, along with Dan Meridor and a few others, are mature democrats who take their roles as MKs seriously.

Oslo forced me to engage with the "Other," to learn, to approach difficult questions with care and not to make irresponsible messianic claims about the land we all hold so dear. It also taught me that Zionism is not always correct in its assumptions and that armies and countries do make errors of judgement and, alas, do act immorally on occasion. Yet this makes the Zionist enterprise no less noble.

Haltingly, in fits and starts, we have shrugged off Buber's pessimism and advanced our cause with dignity. The early Zionists saw the State as the Jewish entry into "normalcy" – a Jewish nation at the table with the family of nations. Later, however, with the help of irredentist pan-Arabism, Menachem Begin et al returned us to the idea of kulam negdeinu (the whole world is against us).

"Oslo" broke Israel out of its persecution complex, yet its democracy has proven weak in the past months. The mentality of fear and isolation persists, inculcating a sense that the state can do no wrong if it acts with force and vigour. The dimensions are different, though, because Oslo has allowed the right to include the left in the mantra of "kulam negdeinu."

Barak is no less Zionist than Ariel Sharon and Avraham Burg is no less Zionist than Rechavam Ze'evi. Yet accusations fly in both directions and Israeli institutions of government and Jewish morality continue to be cheapened. A strong state requires us to close ranks; a strong sense of morality requires us, to borrow from the philosopher John Rawls, to see justice as fairness.

Jews are currently not being fair to each other. In the end, God forbid, this will more likely cause the undoing of our State than the extremist claims and violence of Yasser Arafat and his henchmen.

I hope we can learn from our errors. Yet I am concerned by the tone of the left and right in what passes for political life in Israel.

Candidates and their sites

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This week, I continue my look at political Web sites as Israelis prepare to vote for prime minister on Feb. 6. Today I focus on the candidates and their sites.

The official Likud Web site shows a group of smiling young people and a portrait of party leader Ariel Sharon [http://www.likud.org.il]. The site has a great deal of background and news but the content is mostly in Hebrew with some Russian and no English. The Israeli Foreign Affairs site does have a brief biography of Sharon in English [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00ge0].

You can read some of Sharon's articles and speeches in English online [http://www.freeman.org/m_online/ariela.htm]. In a November speech titled I Am for Lasting Peace, he says, "United, I believe, we can win the battle for peace. But it must be a different peace, one with full recognition of the rights of the Jews in their one and only land: peace with security for generations and peace with a united Jerusalem as the eternal, undivided capital of the Jewish people in the State of Israel forever."

The site also contains a letter from Sharon to Secretary of State Madeleine Albright about his visit to the Temple Mount. "I have expressed my concern and regret at the widespread violence and the senseless loss of lives and injuries on both sides. But it must be clearly understood that it wasn't my visit to the Temple Mount – the holiest site for Jews and under full Israeli sovereignty – that ignited the current outbreak of violence."

The official Ehud Barak Web site has a photo of the candidate along with the headline, "Don't Give Up on the Future" [http://www.barak2001.org.il]. This site is also in Hebrew with some Russian and no English. The Israeli Foreign Affairs site has a brief biography of Barak [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH 00fi0] and the Prime Minister's Office maintains a large English language site which includes an illustrated biography of Barak [http://www.pmo.gov.il/english/ts.exe?tsurl=0.32].

In a section titled Barak's Plan for a Better Israel, there are position papers on everything from democracy in Israel to road safety and peace and security. Barak writes, "Like [Yitzhak] Rabin, I will extend the hand of friendship to our enemies, in the belief that this is the only way to attain real security and economic prosperity for the State of Israel... We are determined to attain peace, taking into account the many dangers involved, to bring the 100-year conflict to an end.

"We will only sign agreements that will ensure the security of the State of Israel. We will continue to fight the bitter war against terrorism with all our might, everywhere... We have no intention of returning to the '67 borders. We will not compromise the security of our residents or the State of Israel. Any agreement that we reach depends on guarding our safe borders and our ability to defend our residents and State."

And what about the footsteps that one of these two candidates will have to walk in? The prime ministers of Israel page has biographies of all 10 Israeli PMs from David Ben-Gurion up to Ehud Barak [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00k60].

Study well, because when you're done, you can test your knowledge at the Israeli Prime Ministers Game [http://www.bus.ualberta.ca/yreshef/zionism/pmgame/pmgame.html]. Match up a historical fact while clicking on the picture of a prime minister and the computer will tell you in a perfect Hebrew accent whether your choice is nachon (correct) or lo nachon (incorrect).

Here's a sample:

(1) I was prime minister during the Six Day War.

(2) Of all prime ministers, my tenure was the shortest.

(3) Under my leadership, my party never won in national elections.

The answers are:
(1) Levi Eshkol
(2) Moshe Sharett
(3) Shimon Peres

We must keep Israel close

By RABBI MOSHE J. YERES

As this week's parshah opens up, the daily life of the Israelites has reached such a low point that they are unable to accept Moses' message of redemption; Moses himself appears to be without any confidence that Pharoah will ever listen to his message.

At this juncture of hopelessness, the Bible pauses from the narrative and in the sixth chapter presents the genealogy of Moses and Aaron, starting with ancestor Levi and his three sons Gershon, Kehat and Merari.

Rabbi Isaiah Horowitz, known as the Holy Shaloh (an acronym of his work Shnei Luchot Habrit), comments and suggests that these names reflect the fact that Levi and his tribal descendants were not included in the original Egyptian decree of servitude.

Levi, though spared the burdens of slavery because Pharoah recognized his tribe as the Israelites' priestly caste, felt compelled to mark his own life with an identification of the distress of his fellow Israelites. The names given to his sons, speculates Shaloh, were thus derivatives of the misery of the Jewish people. Gershon was so called because the Israelites were now made strangers (gerim) in the land that had welcomed them; Kehat refers to the tribulations that had set their teeth on edge (shinehem kehot); Merari was derived from the root maror – bitterness.

The point of this idea cannot be lost on us. Levi, though personally not in any difficulty, had a real need to constantly remember and identify with the members of his faith community who were in travail. We Jews, living in Canada in tranquil peacefulness, with no need to worry about hostile neighbours bent on our destruction, with the ability to go about our daily routines without any change, cannot forget for a moment our brothers and sisters in Israel, who live today under the most trying conditions.

Each of us, in our own way, needs to create a daily sense of their immediacy in our own lives. There are different ways to achieve this goal: religious, social, financial, cultural and personal. A short d'var Torah does not lend itself for detail on each. But each of us must search, not just our hearts, but our minds, hands and feet, and even our wallets to ensure that we keep the Jews of Israel constantly close to us.

We are accustomed to refer to the well-known passage in Leviticus 19:18: "Ve'ahavta lere'acha kamocha" – "Love thy neighbour as thyself." Here we surely find its meaning: Though we are not physically present in Israel, our identity and singularity remain with those who are.

The midrash compares the Jewish people to a docile sheep – when one limb is wounded, the entire animal writhes in pain. When part of klal Yisrael is facing calamity, we have no right to walk around as if our lives remain unaffected.

Rashi, in commenting on Exodus 2:11 where the Bible tells us that "Moses grew up and went out to his brethren," writes that young Moses left the palace and the luxury of an Egyptian prince's life because he needed to be with his brethren the Hebrew slaves and grieve with them. He simply could not remain away from them and their distress. If we are physically not able to be in Israel now, dare we feel any less? Dare we do any less?

The author of the Kuzari, Rabbi Yehuda Halevi, summed it up when he wrote, "Libi bamizrach va'ani bitoch hama'arav" – "Though I live in the West, my heart [and mind] are in the [Mid]east."

Maurice Benzacar to be honoured for his devotion to community

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Maurice Benzacar has been at the centre of many changes in the larger Jewish community for the past 35 years.

But he has also always committed himself to the growth and development of his own Sephardi community since his arrival from Morocco.

Or HaEmet Sephardic School will be honouring Benzacar for his continuous dedication to both the Jewish community at large, and the Sephardi community in particular.

"I was born in the city of Safi in Morocco and then raised in Marakesh and Casablanca," Benzacar said. When he was 25 years old, he became one of the first Moroccan Jews to come to Canada with his wife Elise and his son, Jimmy.

"From my arrival in Toronto in 1957, I was involved in both the Ashkenazi and Sephardic communities," Benzacar said in an interview.

While working as a sales manager at Alliance Dairy, Benzacar would go out, on his own time, to meet immigrants at the airport.

Maurice Benzacar

"I knew how hard it was to arrive from a warm climate to Canada in the middle of winter. So my wife and I would go prepare their apartments. That way, when an immigrant came they felt they were going straight to their home," he said.

By 1964, Benzacar had joined the staff of JIAS and his first job was to help immigrants settle and find employment.

"After the big influx of Moroccan Jews had subsided, things quieted down until 1968, when refugees began arriving from Czechoslovakia," Benzacar said.

On Aug. 21, 1968, Soviet troops invaded Czechoslovakia to overthrow Premier Oldrich Cernick and party leader Alexander Dubcek for their attempted reforms.

The overnight invasion caught many Czech Jews by surprise while they were vacationing in Rome or Vienna, Benzacar explained. These refugees arrived in Canada with barely anything but their educations.

"Many of those that arrived at the time were professionals – doctors and dentists – and it became a big task again to resettle and re-educate them in their various professions."

Then in 1969, during the term of Polish Communist leader Wladyslaw Gomolka, the Jews began arriving from Poland.

"Each time a group arrived in Toronto, I had to learn a little bit of a new language," he said.

"Over the years, people began referring to me as Mr. JIAS because I was their contact person in Toronto."

Benzacar saw a Russian passport for the first time in 1971. That was the beginning of the larger immigration of Russian Jews who began to arrive two years later.

"While my work with JIAS entailed finding jobs for immigrants and giving supplementary assistance, I always tried to ensure that they were recaptured into the community," Benzacar said.

"I spent a few years working with Israel Bonds," he said, "And I was especially touched when some of my clients would come in to invest in the State of Israel."

Throughout the years, Benzacar has also spent his time working for the Sephardi community.

"When we first arrived in Toronto, we thought that we would just join one of the beautiful synagogues that we saw here," he said.

"But when it came to the nusach [style], the prayers and the melodies – we realized that we were completely different. So the first thing we did was start our own services.

"The French speaking began the Magen David Synagogue, and the Spanish speaking began the Petach Tikvah Synagogue."

"Yet the two communities always worked together," he said. "Today we count close to 1,300 families of Sephardic origin and I can turn around and say I'm very proud of our community because not only do we have close to four or five built synagogues, but we also have close to 10 or 12 Sephardic minyanim going on in the city of Toronto. It is the pride of all of us.

"However, we realized that it was crucial to have a day school in the city of Toronto," said Benzacar, who has four children and seven grandchildren.

"Our survival depended on our ability to educate our children, to teach them our Jewish minhagim [customs] and our Jewish nusach, in addition to all the liturgy."

Benzacar, who is now honorary vice-president of Or HaEmet Sephardic School and vice-president of the Sephardic Kehila Centre, said his biggest pride of all was the grand opening of the Centre on Sept. 2, 1997.

"For the past 25 years I've been involved with the fundraising for this building and the Or HaEmet Sephardic School.

"The credit," he said "should go to Rabbi Amram Assayag and Jacques Benquesus. I was there to help."

On Sunday Jan. 28, Or HaEmet will honour Maurice Benzacar for his community work with the Yachin ou Boaz (Pillar of the Community) Award.

Solly Levy, a family friend of Benzacar, noted in an essay on the upcoming event that Yachin and Boaz were the two great pillars of the Beit Hamikdash.

"Yachin was the right-hand pillar… [which] from the kabbalistic standpoint symbolizes three of the attributes of HaShem: Hokhmah [wisdom], Hesed [mercy] and Netsah [firmness].

"Its companion Boaz, the left pillar, consists of Binah [intelligence], Geburah [strength], and Hod [splendour]."

"Maurice Benzacar," Levy notes, "combines the virtues of Yachin and Boaz."

I've been very lucky. My mother had good health for the first 90 years of her life ...

Harvey Starkman as a boy (bottom right) with his mother Lillian (top left), sister Gaille and father Manny.

... But all that changed one day when I visited her in Florida where she spent winters. When I arrived I found her in a lot of pain. She had developed a blood clot in her leg. The next day I flew her back to Toronto for emergency treatment. She was diagnosed with deep venous thrombosis. From there on, she was in and out of hospitals for different things.

She still lived on her own, but her health was starting to fail and I was getting worried. I couldn't be there 24 hours a day and my sister lives out of town. Homecare and nurses came regularly, but I knew it was only a matter of time before I would have to move her into a long-term care facility.

Moving a parent into long-term care ranks right up there with one of life's most difficult and heartbreaking decisions. Baycrest was always my first choice and I put her on the waiting list for the Jewish Home for the Aged.

I knew it might take some time before a room became available, so I took my mother around to tour other long-term care facilities. She attended Baycrest's Special Day Care during this time. It was clear to both of us that no other facility came close to offering the expertise, services and support, as well as the programs that Baycrest has.

When my mother finally moved in to Baycrest in 1998, it was a tremendous worry off my shoulders. Now there are professional health care staff around her at all times. The Home has the Jewish environment that she likes and feels comfortable with. She knows so many people and there are lots of recreational activities to keep her days interesting.

My mother is 96 now and enjoying life. That means a lot to me.

Baycrest is the biggest blessing for the Jewish community.

Rights body denies issuing policy on circumcision

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Ontario Human Rights Commission denies it has adopted a new policy position on male circumcision, despite a revised commission document that includes a medical opinion that circumcisions should not be performed routinely.

Keith Norton, chief commissioner of the Ontario Human Rights Commission, rejected claims of victory by groups fighting to end circumcisions.

"There is no change in our position, no changes in our policy whatsoever," Norton said. "I think it's overblown to call it a reversal or a victory."

The change being trumpeted by opponents of circumcision amounted to a small revision of a commission policy statement on female genital mutilation (FGM), which included a brief reference to male circumcision, he said.

"The only reference to male circumcision in the document at all is to draw a clear distinction between female genital mutilation and male circumcision, to show how different it is," Norton added.

John Antonopoulos, president of the Montreal-based Circumcision Information Resource Centre (CIRC), said prior to recent changes, which were reported in the National Post, the commission document stated male circumcision did not damage the penis and had no effect on male sexuality.

The updated statement "shows it's not a recommended procedure and that the benefits don't outweigh the harms," he said.

Antonopoulos acknowledged that the commission statement focused on female genital mutilation and that it discounted similarities between male circumcision and female genital mutilation. But, he contended,"What's happened now is that there is a better understanding. They are dissimilar, but they do share similarities."

Circumcising newborns raises "serious issues of medical ethics and human rights," Antonopoulos said. "When you amputate something that is normal and healthy without permission, it raises ethical issues."

Antonopolous suggested the discussion could prove "troublesome" to Jews who practise circumcision for religious reasons. He welcomed debate on the issue and said that "anybody who looks at this will see the problems."

Canadian Jewish Congress weighed into the issue with a letter from Keith Landy, chair of its Ontario region, to the National Post. The letter disputed claims made by opponents of circumcision that there were no medical benefits to the procedure.

"Scientific literature oscillates between claims of benefit and no benefits," Landy said. "The most recent finding, as reported in the British Medical Journal (June 2000), has Australian researchers contending that circumcision is invaluable in containing the spread of AIDS. Indeed, according to an article in the Forward (July 21, 2000), 'In the last 10 years, more than 40 separate studies have pointed to a correlation between circumcision and reduced rates of HIV.'"

Landy said, "Those opposed to male circumcision are resorting to demagoguery in equating the procedure to female genital mutilation."

He also contended that "adherents of Judaism and Islam practise male circumcision not for any health or sexual benefits, but simply because, for them, it is a divine commandment."

Norton said the commission has not adopted a policy on religious circumcisions and it has declined requests to develop a policy on medical circumcisions. The commission's policy papers do not have the force of law and are not binding on courts or rights tribunals. They serve a primarily educational purpose, indicating to the public the commission's thinking on current issues.

"I don't think we've had a case that's come before the commission" on female genital mutilation, he said.

The revised commission document cited in the Post article is called Policy on Female Genital Mutilation. It contains a two paragraph section in which it rejects comparison between FGM and male circumcision.

Referring to circumcision, the document states: "The Canadian Pediatric Society conducted a literature review and concluded that 'the overall evidence of the benefits and harms of male circumcision is so evenly balanced,' that 'the benefits have not been shown to clearly outweigh the risks and costs' and that male 'circumcision for newborns should not be routinely performed.'"

TORONTO — Ben Lappin, executive director from 1948 to 1958 of what was then known as Canadian Jewish Congress, central division, died recently at his home in Netanya, Israel. He was 86.

Obituary

Lappin, who came to Canada from Poland when he was nine years old, started at Congress as director of community relations in the early 1940s.

"He always had a bent for community work. As a youth, he was active in the Labour Zionist Youth group," said longtime friend Ben Kayfetz, former executive director of CJC, Ontario region, who took over Lappin's community relations job when Lappin became executive director.

Lappin left Congress to continue his education, and eventually obtained his PhD in social work from McMaster University. After he graduated, he and his wife Adah made aliyah, and Lappin set up the school of social work at Bar-Ilan University.

Wolfe Goodman, a Toronto lawyer and close family friend, said it was through determination and hard work that Lappin, who came to Canada speaking no English, was able to reach such academic heights.

He was a capable Jewish civil servant, and was known as an outstanding lecturer, said Millie Goodman, Wolfe's wife. "He lectured until quite recently, and former students still came to see him to discuss their problems."

Lappin was the author of two books, one about community organizations called Community Organization – Its Prime, Its Practice, Its Theory, and the second, Redeemed Children, about Jewish war orphans, written after he administered a Congress project to bring the orphans to Canada.

While still in Toronto, he wrote some of the early Spring Thaw shows, annual theatrical reviews performed in the city.

"He was know for his tremendous sense of humour – he was one of the best raconteurs of Jewish jokes – and he was very much a man from Kieltz. It remained forever in his heart," Kayfetz said.

"He was a great friend, and competent in everything he did. We're all going to miss him," said Millie Goodman.

Lappin leaves his wife, four children, Sholom, David, Naomi and Daniel, and 10 grandchildren.

Funeral services were held in Israel.

Workaholic rabbi willing to push the envelope

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite a belief that the Jewish community is more polarized than ever before, one of today's leading Jewish thinkers and proponents of pluralism says he remains hopeful about the future.

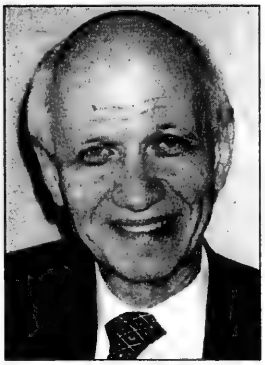
Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg has long been known as the co-founder in 1972 of CLAL – The National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, headquartered in New York – but these days he serves full time, and then some, as president of the Jewish Life Network (JLN), brainchild of New York philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, one of the chief architects of Birthright Israel. Rabbi Greenberg is also chair of the US Holocaust Memorial Museum.

"I have never worked this hard in my life," said the rabbi in an interview last week, speaking on his cell phone during an hour-long taxi ride, en route from Philadelphia to a friend's shiva in New Jersey.

Rabbi Greenberg, who is in Toronto this week (Thursday to Saturday) to give five lectures as part of a series at Beth Tzedec Congregation, says he did not leave CLAL out of any sense of discouragement.

"It was a special opportunity," said the 67-year-old self-confessed workaholic, noting that he hadn't had the resources to undertake some of the projects he'd dreamed of. "Here was someone thinking very big, willing to push the envelope. You don't always get that opportunity in your sixties. I felt it was just right."

He took on the JLN presidency in 1995 on a part-time basis for more than two years, easing the transition toward a fuller break with CLAL, with which he maintains a limited involvement. Since he joined Steinhardt's organization full-time, his former organization hasn't missed a beat, he noted.



Yitz Greenberg

At JLN, his projects, including Birthright and MAKOR, a centre for Jews in their twenties and thirties, are based on pluralistic principles, focus on education, religion and culture, and target some of "the most integrated [Jews] in American life."

Early last week he returned from Israel, where he travelled with participants in Birthright Israel, a project he was involved in developing.

Seeing the emotional response of young people being turned on to contemporary Israel during the 10-day free trip was an experience he described as "electrifying. It was almost a heady experience."

In contrast, the recent spate of violence in the country has been "a really big setback" after it made such progress toward "what appeared to us to be peace."

To go through this difficult period "without giving up, and without becoming violent ourselves," will be a test of maturity, he believes.

Rabbi Greenberg also admitted to occasional discouragement in recent years over the polarization of the Jewish community in North America and Israel. The language alone, between Orthodox and Reform factions, has been "vile," he said.

"We're very close to two people in the United States… the Orthodox and the non-Orthodox," said the rabbi, who has Orthodox smichah and a PhD from Harvard University.

Ironically, freedom and power within the greater community have allowed internal divisions to grow, he believes. "As long as the Jews were afraid of the gentiles, they tended to curb hostility [and] stick together… I think we get drunk on freedom. With sobriety, people are starting to realize they can't afford this kind of fighting."

The situation is better in Canada than in the United States or Israel, he added.

As a pluralist and a Modern Orthodox rabbi, Rabbi Greenberg represents a small minority in the Orthodox world. The fact that there are others like him – individual thinkers – "here and there," heartens him.

"I see them as the wave of the future," he said, speculating that it could take five years, or fifty, before their impact is felt.

"You can't afford the luxury of giving up or despairing."

Respected actor passes away at the age of 65

An estimated 1,000 people filled the sanctuary of Holy Blossom Temple for his funeral on Friday afternoon. Mourners included Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman, Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino (Waxman was an honorary member of the Toronto police force), producer Norman Jewison, actors Tyne Daly and Martha Henry, CJC president Moshe Ronen, Leslie Dan and David Mirvish. Outside the synagogue were members of Toronto's mounted police and the Chief of Police's ceremonial guard.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, whom Waxman considered his rabbi, and with whom he had been studying, described him as "a Canadian icon, a proud Canadian, a proud actor, a proud Jew, a Renaissance man." Like the good actor he was, she said, "He left us wanting more."

Greenspan remembered that when auditions were being held for the CBC radio drama Scales of Justice, both he and Waxman vied for the role of Eddie Greenspan.

"Al got the part," Greenspan admitted wryly, adding, "Since then, whenever I go to court, I think about how Al would have played it."

Waxman's son Adam said it was comforting to see "such a diversity of people." He praised his father for his love and respect for learning, his dedication to his craft, his passion for everything he did, and for the love and respect he showed to his wife, Sara. "I'm so proud of my dad. He was my king."

> "A Canadian icon, a proud Canadian, a proud actor, a proud Jew, a Renaissance man."

Waxman was born in Toronto in 1935. He attended Oakwood and Vaughan collegiates, the University of Western Ontario, and the University of Toronto Law School. The acting bug hit him while he was still in his teens, and he eventually left law school to study and act in New York and London.

In a career that spanned over 40 years, Waxman performed on television, in movies and in the theatre. He also was a director, directing such productions as last year's The Diary of Anne Frank at the Stratford Festival.

Waxman's television credits include the CTV series Twice in a Lifetime, Power Play, the still-unaired Me & My Shadows, Due South, Naked City, Gotti, Net Worth, Street Legal, Murder She Wrote and Twitch City. His first movie appearances were in The Hired Gun and The War Lover.

Other films included At the End of the Day: The Sue Rodriguez Story, The Assignment, Malarek, A Star is Lost, The Last Act of Martin Weston and the Oscar-nominated The Hurricane.

Waxman received much critical praise for his performances. In 1997, he received a Gemini award for The Winnings of Frankie Walls, and in 1998, he received The Earle Grey Award, a special Gemini that recognizes an actor's body of work.

> He received The Earle Grey Award

His performance as Willie Loman in Arthur Miller's Death of A Salesman at Stratford in 1998 was universally acclaimed. He was slated to appear as Shylock in The Merchant of Venice at the festival later this year.

Yet Waxman's activities were not restricted to acting and directing.

He was scheduled to be chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' triennial plenary in Toronto this coming May. CJC president Moshe Ronen said that the organization has decided "to dedicate the event to him, to pay tribute to his remarkable contribution to Canada."

In a media release, Ronen praised Waxman as "an admired and much beloved actor, writer and director whose achievements in all the media have been outstanding and have been recognized internationally."

Waxman was involved with B'nai Brith, Shaarei Zedec Hospital in Jerusalem, United Jewish Appeal and Israel Bonds. Believing that he should devote equal time to both Jewish and non-Jewish causes, he also worked for Big Brothers, Variety Club, United Way and the Canadian Cancer Society. He served as chair of the Academy of Canadian Cinema and Television.

Named to The Order of Ontario in 1996 and to The Order of Canada later that year, Waxman was probably one of the most easily recognized figures in Canadian show business. Many onlookers at the funeral and on the streets said that they felt as if they had known him personally. He was, to use Shakespeare's words, "well-graced."

Waxman is survived by his wife, food writer and restaurant critic Sara, and children Adam and Tobaron.

Virtual shul hopes to tear down denominational walls

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One day soon you can be "connected" to Judaism in more ways than one.

It had to happen sooner or later: a virtual synagogue. When it's online, www.myShul.org (or .net; the exact domain name hasn't yet been determined) hopes to become the world's first truly global Jewish congregation, offering shut-ins, the isolated, the unaffiliated or the just curious the chance to click their way to the synagogue of their dreams.

Obviously, the cyber-shul won't have many of the trappings of a physical synagogue; there's no virtual schnapps and herring (yet). But those behind the effort say it's a serious attempt to bring disinterested and disenchanted Jews into the fold, using 21st-century technology.

To be based in Toronto, the site seeks to recreate a bricks-and-mortar synagogue in the ether of cyberspace. Various "rooms" will be replicated, including a sanctuary, social hall, classroom, library – even a gift shop.

Organizers say myShul will also tear down denominational walls by welcoming all Jews through participation in real-time prayer, music, study, chat rooms and other interaction.

"I have total belief that you can create a community online," says Sandy Stern, the project's creator. "It's not an end in itself. I would like to see people go to shuls in their areas, but there has been a failing in Judaism to connect to the secular and unaffiliated."

Stern, a social worker and administrative assistant at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, has been working on this for over two years alongside Rabbi Michael Skobac of the outreach and counter-missionary group Jews for Judaism. The project has won enthusiastic support from Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, community leader (and CJN president) Donald Carr, and Brig.-Gen. Ed Fitch, the highest ranking Jewish member of the Canadian Armed Forces.

They're confident myShul will stand out, even amid all the clutter of cyberspace. According to Irving Green, author of Judaism on the Web, there are more than 5,000 Jewish sites on the Internet covering everything from the weekly parsha, basic Judaism, advanced Talmud study, "ask the rabbi" services, Jewish music, and classes in Hebrew and Yiddish. Add to that scores of Jewish bulletin boards, news services, archives, chat rooms and the Lechaim Cybershul (on America Online only), and choices for the Jewish Internet surfer can be bewildering.

As is the number of people connected to the Web. They're some 200 million now, and expected to rise to 500 million by 2003. So how can the intimate experience of prayer and study be replicated in such a vast, cold medium?

Rabbi Skobac, who says he does a lot of counselling on the Web already, likens a cyber-synagogue to last year's online chess match that pitted the world against former champion Gary Kasparov.

"Even though thousands of people were hooked up, you felt as though you mattered," he recalls. "It was an incredibly special feeling."

Meantime, a whole new crop of halachic challenges has arisen. Is a virtual minyan kosher? Does a cyber-Torah have the same significance as a real one?

"I'm sure the rabbis will have a handful," Rabbi Skobac smiles.

They may be emboldened by a recent article in The Economist, which argued that Judaism seems to be the religion that is most adaptable to a Web environment. That's because Judaism is "pragmatic, with a duty to use all inventions for the glory of God, computer networks included."

MyShul's mock-up is impressive. Users will be able to click on a palette of choices to customize their synagogue experience. One could, for example, start with some pre-recorded cantorial or Yiddish music, proceed to a live prayer service (with text), listen to a d'var Torah, hear a story, debate a fine point in a chat room and finish with a "visit" to the Western Wall, where a "Kotel-Cam" feeds live pictures around the clock and even provides a way to send a message to the wall's crevices. Virtual seders are planned too, as is a Kids' Corner and links to thousands of Jewish sites.

"Spirituality is a process," says Stern. "The key to myShul is spiritual connection."

The replication of a true community experience was described recently in a Washington Jewish Week article on AOL's Cybershul.

"In a profound paradox, these worshippers, sitting alone with their computers and separated by thousands of miles, report feeling 'closer' to their online companions than their actual shul friends," the paper stated. Quoting a member, it added, "We share our simchas and sorrows here. We have named babies. We have said Kaddish together and grieved together. We have cried together and laughed together and sometimes even debated with each other."

Stern and Rabbi Skobac hope to recreate the same feelings of warmth and togetherness. But their first priority is to reach out to the thousands of unaffiliated and secular Jews who are drifting away, the infirm, and those who have been turned off by "real" synagogues.

"The whole idea is to offer a non-threatening, spiritually inviting place for them," says Martin Hoffmitz, a Toronto marketing and sales executive and one of the site's boosters. "It will encourage people to build their own spiritual space at a level that's comfortable for them. We're not selling a specific brand of Judaism. We're selling Judaism."

Stern isn't intimidated by the fact that her project has the potential to change the Jewish world. In fact, she embraces it.

"I'm not crazy," she says. "I'm a big dreamer."

Fruity treats for Tu b'Shvat

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Tu b'Shvat seders are based on an ancient kabbalistic manual called P'ri Etz Hadar (Fruit of the Goodly Tree), as well as on passages from the Talmud and other works relating to fruits, nuts and spring.

At least four different types of wine or fruit juice are served at the seder, and in some Ashkenazi households, the prevalent custom is to serve 15 to 30 different types of fruit (fresh, dried or canned) and nuts.

Sephardi Jews, who sometimes call the holiday Las Frutas (Feasts of Fruits) may have as many as 50 different types of fruits and nuts.

BUTTERED RUM PINEAPPLE

½ cup finely chopped macadamia nuts
1 large pineapple
½ cup melted butter or margarine
½ cup honey
¼ cup rum
Non-stick vegetable oil spray
Vanilla or pareve ice cream

Spread nuts on baking sheet and bake at 400 until golden. (Approx. 4 to 5 min) Set aside. Set oven to broil. Pare and cut pineapple crosswise into 8 1-inch thick slices. Score edges. In a saucepan, over medium heat, stir butter/margarine with the honey and rum. Remove from heat, and with a fork dip each piece of pineapple into the mixture, making sure both sides are coated, then draining off excess. Place pineapple on coated broiler rack and broil slices until lightly browned on each side. When slices are cool enough to handle, coat edges with ground nuts. Place the pineapple slices on serving plates, top with ice cream. Pour remaining sauce and nuts over the top. Serves 8.

DOUBLE APRICOT BREAD

1 16-oz. can apricot halves, drained
1¾ cup all-purpose flour
¾ cup whole wheat flour
1¼ cups sugar
3½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. pumpkin pie spice
2 beaten eggs
½ cup milk
3 tbsp. cooking oil
1 cup diced dried apricots

In a blender container or food processor bowl blend or process canned apricot halves until smooth. Set aside. In a large bowl combine all-purpose flour, whole wheat flour, sugar, baking powder, salt and pumpkin pie spice. In another bowl combine eggs, the apricot puree, milk, and cooking oil. Add to flour mixture, stirring just until combined. Stir in dried apricots. Pour into two greased and floured 8x4-in. or 7½x3½x2-in. loaf pans. Bake at 350 for 45 to 50 minutes or until a toothpick inserted near centre comes out clean.

Cool in pans 10 minutes. Remove from pans. Cool completely. Slice and serve with margarine or butter, if desired. Makes 2 loaves. This can be made ahead of time and stays well wrapped in foil and refrigerated for up to 3 days. Or wrap in foil and freeze up to one month. Thaw overnight before serving.

SPICY PECANS

1 to 1½ tsp. chili powder
1 tsp. curry powder
1 tsp. garlic salt
¼ tsp. ground cumin
¼ tsp. ground ginger
¼ tsp. ground cinnamon
3 tbsp. olive oil or cooking oil
1 tsp.Worcestershire sauce
¼ to ½ tsp. bottled hot pepper sauce
3 cups pecan halves

In a skillet, mix chili powder, curry powder, garlic salt, cumin, ginger and cinnamon. Stir in olive oil, Worcestershire sauce, and hot pepper sauce. Cook and stir over low heat 5 minutes to mellow flavours. Place pecan halves in a bowl; add the spice mixture. Toss to coat evenly. Spread pecan halves in a single layer in a baking pan. Bake at 325 for 15 minutes, stirring occasionally. Spread nuts on foil and cool completely. Makes 3 cups (12 ¼-cup servings). Make-ahead tip: Prepare and cool nuts. Seal in an airtight container; store 3 days at room temperature, one week in refrigerator or one month in freezer.

TWICE BAKED ALMOND CROISSANTS

For orange syrup
¾ cup granulated sugar
½ cup water
1 tsp. vanilla
¼ cup fresh orange juice

For almond cream
½ cup natural almonds
¼ cup granulated sugar
¼ cup almond paste (not marzipan), cut into pieces
5 tbsp. unsalted butter, softened
1 large egg
1 tbsp. rum
½ tsp. almond extract
8 (day-old) croissants
¾ cup sliced natural almonds (3 oz), toasted
Powdered sugar for dusting

Syrup: Combine sugar and water in a small saucepan. Add the vanilla to the sugar mixture. Bring to a boil, stirring until sugar is dissolved. Simmer 1 minute, then remove from heat and stir in orange juice.

Almond cream: Pulse almonds with 2 tbsp. sugar in a food processor until finely ground. Add almond paste and pulse until finely chopped. Beat together butter, remaining 2 tbsp. sugar, almond mixture, and a pinch of salt, using an electric mixer at medium speed, until fluffy, 2 to 3 minutes.

Whisk together egg, rum and extract in a small bowl and gradually add to almond cream, beating until combined well. Chill, covered, until set, about 1 hour.

Assemble croissants: Preheat oven to 350. Cut croissants in half horizontally. Brush insides of croissants (both top and bottom halves) with some orange syrup. Spread 2 tbsp. almond cream on each bottom half, mounding in centres, and cover with tops. Spread 1 tbsp. almond cream on each top. Transfer croissants to a parchment-lined baking sheet and sprinkle about 2 tbsp. toasted almonds on each. Bake croissants in middle of oven until golden brown, 20 to 25 minutes. Cool slightly, then dust with powdered sugar. Note: Orange syrup and almond cream may be made and almonds may be toasted, 1 day ahead and chilled, covered.

Pickets down, stress levels remain high at York

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — I have never been this excited to be swamped with work, sleep deprived, stressed out and addicted to caffeine: the CUPE (Canadian Union of Public Employees) strike at York University is over, and I'm finally back to school.

Second semester classes will begin Feb. 26, after a one month remedial period to make up for the class time lost and exams missed since Oct. 26, when Local 3903, the approximately 1600 teaching assistants (TAs) and part-timers, went on strike.

Yet problems do not end with the removal of the picket lines: because reading week has been cancelled and the school year extended, many students are being forced to cancel travel plans and shorten their summer jobs.

In addition, Prof. Martin Lockshin, chair, division of humanities, faculty of arts, and professor of religious studies, indicates that the condensed exam periods in February and May are sure to cause difficulties for many Jewish students at York.

To make the most of each exam day within the shortened ten- and twelve-day exam periods in February and May respectively, the senate executive has decided that exams will be held not only in the regular Monday to Friday time slots, but also on weekends and evenings up to ten o'clock at night, with the only exception being Sunday night.

The senate has taken into consideration the problem this poses for a large number of observant Jews by suggesting, "Students for whom an examination date poses a conflict with their religious practice should contact the course director immediately."

To arrange an alternative date, students must complete an examination accommodation form, available from the registrar's office.

For Jewish students (such as myself) who are not necessarily observant yet see it as a priority to be with family for the Friday night Shabbat dinner, the exam schedule poses an ethical dilemma: what are the religious grounds for requesting an alternative exam date?

Meanwhile, as the compression of the exam period poses problems, the extension of the school year creates other complications for students in York's Jewish teacher education program, who will now have shorter practicums in May as a result.

Prof. Alex Pomson, director of the program, argues that the strike "involved additional stress" for his students because a higher proportion (approximately 20 percent) are not from Toronto. Students come from cities such as Calgary, Winnipeg, London and Ottawa for this specialized stream within York's faculty of education.

Although the university has extended its residence leases, those who rent in Toronto are at a disadvantage now that their stays in the city have been lengthened.

Moreover, their crucial in-classroom time has been shortened and moved to the end of the school year, when most teachers are wrapping up. A few students in the first year of the program were turned away from their practicums during the strike, as some public schools would not supervise their York student-teachers in support of the strikers. Most were not affected, however. After the first year of the program, practicums are held in the parochial schools, where student teachers were not turned away.

Travel plans have also been affected by the strike. York students selected for the mid-February Birthright Israel tour, which fell conveniently into York's reading week, Feb. 12-16, may have to postpone their trips.

York cancelled reading week to allow time to finish up first-semester courses. (With the exception of Osgoode Hall law school, Schulich school of business, the school of nursing, and parts of the faculty of education, the majority of undergraduate classes were not held during the strike.) The December exam period has been moved to Feb 13-23, and most of the Birthright Israel trips fall somewhere between those dates.

Most professors understand the repercussions of the strike and are attempting to accommodate students by offering extensions and rescheduling when necessary.

York's administration is encouraging students to consult with their professors in the case of an exam conflict. In such cases, students are being asked to provide their professors with a statement about the nature of the commitment and evidence that the commitment was made before January 9, 2001 (For further details, see York's website at www.yorku.ca).

Shayna Allen, co-ordinator of graduate and professional programs for Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS), which has a significant role in the programming and organizing of Birthright Israel, assures, "We are more than happy to provide that documentation for them."

Other students with more complicated scheduling difficulties may have to withdraw from the reading week Birthright Israel trips altogether, which have not yet been cancelled as a result of the strike.

But Zac Kaye, executive director of JCS, maintains, "They'll go." It is just a matter of when. Some students may join the summer Birthright Israel trips beginning in May. Yet this alternative unleashes another slew of scheduling conflicts since the York school year has been extended until May 11, with a final exam period from May 12 to 26.

Kaye affirms, however, that although "York students may be in a no-win situation this year…we will try our best to accommodate them." At worst, their spots will be held until the December 2001 or January 2002 Birthright Israel tours.

Meanwhile, JCS programs held on campus, such as those planned during Holocaust Education Week, were cancelled.

But JCS doesn't just plan events: because it had representatives at some of the York administrative meetings, it was able to disseminate important strike information to students throughout.

Now that the strike is over, JCS will reopen its offices on York's campus and continue its regular programming. And those activities are sure to come as a nice break from studying.

Lara Rabinovitch is a third year McGill University student studying at York University for the year.

New site for Chabad centre approved

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After three years of trying, it looks like the Côte St. Luc branch of Chabad Lubavitch will be able to build a community centre/synagogue in that municipality.

The city council has unanimously voted in favour of the group's most recent site proposal – 26,000 square feet of land at the eastern end of Kildare Road, abutting the snow dump and diagonally across from Bialik High School. This is the fourth site that Chabad has sought for the project.

The city-owned land is currently zoned for parkland or other municipal use. Mayor Robert Libman said he does not anticipate major opposition to the project, which will require re-zoning, because the site is at the city limits and not surrounded by housing.

In 1999, the project was the subject of a lengthy, heated dispute between residents who supported and those who opposed the previous site Chabad wanted near the Cavendish Mall, at the corner of Kellert Avenue and Kildare. The eight city councillors were evenly divided on the issue.

The council initially rejected the Kildare site last July because of concerns that having an institution so nearby would not conform to new provincial standards on snow dumps. Chabad's earlier plans showed the centre would have to encroach on the dump.

Both votes were taken in camera.

Libman said it appears now that the Chabad centre can be accommodated without any violations, and only in winters with unusually high amounts of snow should the dumping come anywhere close to the centre. Chabad has also agreed that work may go on at the dump on Saturdays, even though it may disturb its Shabbat observances, Libman said.

Rabbi Mendel Raskin, the centre's leader, said he was very happy that it appears the project will finally be going ahead.

"I think it is the best site [of all four considered]," he said. "The Lubavitcher Rebbe said we should live not where we enjoy but where we are needed, and there is no synagogue in that area."

The project was originally estimated at $3 million. Rabbi Raskin said he could not say exactly how much it will now cost, but "it won't be more." Plans are being drawn for the new site.

The next step will be for Chabad to submit its plans to the city and request a re-zoning. Rabbi Raskin said that could be within two or three months.

He is confident that the project is still eligible for a $820,000 grant promised by the Quebec government in October, 1998. Prior to that announcement, Premier Lucien Bouchard attended a fund-raising event held by Chabad and appeared to take a strong personal interest in the project.

"In November, a few of my friends spoke to Bouchard and he assured them the grant was still there. He was shocked to hear that there had been opposition [to the project]," Rabbi Raskin said.

Since Bouchard made known his plans to resign, Rabbi Raskin said he phoned the premier's office and was reassured the grant is available.

Libman said he has heard "mild" complaints about the new site, but said the city is taking steps to mitigate the concerns, which are mainly about traffic.

For example, he said Chabad has been asked not to have drop-off for its day care at the same time as that for Bialik. The high school's peak is between 8 a.m. and 8:20 a.m., so Chabad should see that parents have their children at the day care no later than 8 a.m.

In addition, the city plans to widen Kildare by one lane, near Cavendish Boulevard.

The Chabad project has been one of the most divisive issues Côte St. Luc has had to deal with in recent years.

Opponents said they feared a centre at that location would increase traffic and noise and cause parking problems. They also felt the building would adversely effect the community gardens next door.

Diplomats' courageous actions focus of new exhibition

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Representatives of foreign embassies to Canada recently attended the launch of an exhibit titled "Visa for Life: Diplomats Who Rescued Jews" at the National Library of Canada.

Sponsored by the Embassy of Israel, the exhibit chronicles in pictographic format the dramatic and courageous actions of nine diplomats who used their positions to save the lives of Jews during the Holocaust.

Acting against the explicit orders of their superiors and risking their careers, these individuals included American, Chinese, Dutch, Italian, Japanese, Portuguese, Spanish, Swedish and Swiss diplomats.

Haim Divon, ambassador of Israel to Canada, acknowledged the presence of Deputy Prime Minister Herb Gray as well as diplomats from the various missions represented in the exhibit.

"I am delighted that you have joined us in honouring the exploits of your predecessors," Divon said. "I would like to encourage you to bring your colleagues, your families and especially your children to the National Library to view 'Visa for Life.' These stories deserve to be told."

During the Holocaust, as Jews were trying desperately to escape from Germany and were being refused entry by country after country, Shanghai was the only place in the world that would allow people to enter without a visa or official document of any kind. Sephardic Jews had already arrived there in the mid-19th century and Russian Jews settled there in the early 1900s.

Between 1937 and 1941, over 20,000 Jews arrived in Shanghai from Europe. One of them, Tova Clark, escaped from Berlin at the age of one year with her parents. Clark has subsequently lived in many countries and has made Ottawa her home for a number of years.

At the launch, Clark read a chapter from Compartments, her autobiography-in-progress, about her family's experiences in Shanghai during the war years. Some of her stories included personal memories from the bombing of the Jewish ghetto by Americans and their subsequent apology to the joy of children upon receiving such treats as Mars bars from the Joint Jewish Distribution Committee (the Joint).

"Visa for Life: Diplomats Who Rescued Jews" will remain at the National Library until Feb. 4, 2001.

Intentions should be counted

Two unrelated developments that have received considerable media play recently are worthy of our consideration, not so much for the substance of either issue, but rather for the lesson that can be derived in the way we navigate through news.

The first relates to the ongoing "scandal" plaguing Stockwell Day. Day once wrote a letter viewed as libellous by the target of his criticism. When Day refused to recant or even soften his implied charges, the man, a Red Deer lawyer and school trustee, filed suit against the Alberta treasurer. The case dragged on and was finally settled at a cost of almost $800,000.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Day is being lambasted in the media for having pursued this case. While it is true that Day only accessed the public funds because the law prohibited him from raising the defence fund privately, the criticism is more about his lack of judgment than the amount of money it will cost taxpayers. His actions, voluntary and deliberate, it is argued, were inappropriate and challenged the very essence of our societal values that place a premium on the rule of law and due process. Day should have known better than to engage in public discussion about a matter before the courts. As a senior member of the government, his judgement and subsequent defence of his actions merit strong criticism.

By contrast, the other issue relates to the almost farcical tale of a congratulatory note from Governor General Adrienne Clarkson to a gay couple whose marriage in a church was registered by the officiating clergyperson. All of a sudden, she has become the focus of debate about the propriety of the Queen's representative getting directly involved in so charged a political, religious and social issue. All of this because an innocuous form letter sent by her staff declining the invitation – apparently one of hundreds that come in to Rideau Hall each week – and concluding with wishes for "all the best." Quel scandal!!!

The lesson that must be learned from this is that actions can only be meaningfully interpreted when placed in full context. Some concluded that Day is being made a scapegoat since he initially wanted to organize a private fund to cover the legal costs of the defence. That, however, would be limiting consideration of the issue to an almost irrelevant "sidebar." Conversely, attributing to the GG's note significance never originally contemplated, falsely attaches unintended meaning to an otherwise benign act.

The lesson in all of this? Simply, that intentions count and should be counted.

Israeli couple helps North Bay Jewish community

By PHIL NOVAK
Special to The CJN

NORTH BAY — It's a long way from the Middle East to Ontario's North East, but Limor and Ronen Hershco are happy they made the journey.

The Hershcos came to North Bay three months ago as part of Project Areivim, a Jerusalem-based outreach program which sends Israeli educators to communities throughout the world.

Based on the Talmudic ideal that all Jews are responsible for one another, the project's volunteer emissaries – their living expenses and flights are paid for – help rejuvenate Jewish cultural and religious traditions in small Jewish enclaves around the world.

And they don't come much smaller than North Bay's.

"We have 20 families who we know of, which works out to between 50 and 60 people," said Marty Brown, a member of the Sons of Jacob synagogue, and the congregation's unofficial rabbi.

Brown said the local Jewish community had been without professional leadership since a real rabbi, Imre Balla, left in 1983.

"But we received a new lease on life Sept. 15 when Limor and Ronen arrived from Israel. Their youthful enthusiasm is contagious and thanks to their efforts, the lights are on in the synagogue far more than they have been in years."

Project Areivim requires a minimum one-year commitment, with an option for a second. Volunteers initiate a variety of cultural, educational, and social activities, designed to increase Jewish awareness, knowledge, and pride, to bridge the gap among Jews of different backgrounds, and to promote understanding of Israel and its ideals.

So far, its Canadian contingent consists of volunteers in North Bay, Moncton, St. John's and Saskatoon.

Since arriving in North Bay, the Hershcos quickly set up Hebrew classes for adults and also began teaching Jewish customs to school-age children.

As well, they're whipping the grown-ups into shape every Sunday night with their spirited Israeli folk dance classes.

The Hershcos also travel to Sudbury, where they provide similar programming.

"We do this because we want to help preserve our culture in other places," said Limor, 30, a teacher and travel guide. "We can always make the money later."

Jews first began moving to North Bay from Europe in the early 1900s, working primarily as fur buyers, scrap metal dealers, and merchants, said Marty Brown's father, Herb, whose own father, Phil, emigrated here in 1910.

Herb, born and raised in North Bay, is the de facto patriarch of the city's Jewish community. A former Citizen of the Year, and likely the only Jew ever to be chair of a Catholic hospital, he said it was on Main Street, historically, that the fledgling community had its most visible presence.

"You had Harry and Rose Himmel, who opened Himmel's Ladies Wear, which lasted until it was closed in 1990," said Brown. "People like So Waiser, Joe Rosenberg, Manny Gurevitch and Ben Herman were also opening up shops."

At the community's height, Brown said, there were between 50 and 60 Jewish families in North Bay.

"But as these shop owners retired or died, their children decided not to go into the family business and chose professions instead and moved out of town. So many of the kids I grew up became doctors, lawyers, and engineers, but they ended up working in Toronto, or Ottawa, or Montreal, and not here."

When Brown found out about Project Areivim through the Canadian Jewish Congress, he immediately put in a request.

Meanwhile, on the other side of the world, Ronen and Limor, newly married, decided they wanted to become Project Areivim volunteers.

"We asked to be sent to a warm country like, maybe, Australia," said Ronen, 30, a sports administrator. "The three choices they gave us turned out to be Zimbabwe, Greece and North Bay."

Political turmoil in Zimbabwe, and uncertainty in Greece about bringing in "areivim," ended up sending the Hershcos to North Bay, essentially by default.

"In the beginning, I was running to the Internet to see where is North Bay and what is North Bay," Ronen said. "And then when we came to Toronto somebody told us that North Bay is covered with snow for nine months every year."

The couple admits to having suffered culture shock when first arriving in the city, but now enjoy the relaxed pace "and the warm people."

They recently celebrated their first wedding anniversary here, and Ronen said they really do feel part of the entire community.

"I play indoor soccer and I met people from all over. We went to this parade and the soccer team had a float in it. We went to see the parade and someone on top of the float saw me and yelled out, 'Hey, Ronen!'

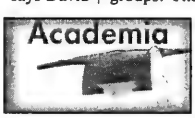
"Can you imagine? All the way from Israel, and I hear someone call out my name."

U of T prof promotes Christian-Jewish relations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

He calls it "one of the best kept secrets of the past half century."

Christianity's attitude toward Judaism has undergone a "sea change," says David Novak, holder of the J. Richard and Dorothy Shiff Chair of Jewish Studies at the University of Toronto.



Radically breaking with tradition, Roman Catholic and Protestant churches have formed a positive relationship with Judaism. Last September, in recognition of this historic development, 170 North American Jewish religious leaders from all streams of Judaism issued a public statement, Dabru Emet, commenting on it.

Novak, a specialist in Jewish law and ethics, played an important role in the publication of Dabru Emet (speak the truth), having written the original working paper.

Since Roman Catholic and Protestant theologians had expressed remorse over Christianity's treatment of Jews and Judaism, Jews were duty-bound to issue a formal response, said Novak, author of a 1989 book entitled Jewish-Christian Dialogue: A Jewish Justification.

"It would have been foolish not to have returned the compliment," observed Novak, an ordained Conservative rabbi who has been a fulltime academic since 1989. "It would have been silly not to have encouraged our friends."

Novak believes that the church has ceased being a source of anti-Semitism. "Today, anti-Semitism is coming from Arab sympathizers and neo-Nazi pagan groups. The church has made efforts to combat anti-Semitism. In the past, it was quiet. Jews should recognize that."

The church revised its attitude toward Jews for at least two reasons, said Novak. The Holocaust left a profound impression of guilt on many Christians, while, in their eyes, the emergence of Israel was a fulfillment of biblical prophecy.

Novak is pleased that the Christian response to Dabru Emet – which has been translated into German and Polish – has been overwhelmingly positive.

A graduate of the University of Chicago, the Jewish Theological Seminary and Georgetown University, Novak joined the University of Toronto in 1997. He arrived in Canada via the University of Virginia, where he had been a professor of modern Judaic studies since 1989.

Prior to that, he was a rabbi in Far Rockaway, New York; Norfolk, Virginia; Baltimore, Maryland; Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; and Washington, D.C.

Novak began teaching philosophy in 1969 at Oklahoma City University while he was still a rabbi. "I enjoyed being a rabbi, but my interests were always scholarly and academic."

Born and raised in Chicago, he is the son of Syd and Sylvia Novak, a ladies' garment manufacturer and a prima ballerina.

"Since I was a little child, I wanted to be a rabbi," he said. "I had always been attracted to learning, and rabbis seemed to be learned people."

Novak, now 59, hewed to a definite career plan. First he would be a rabbi and then a scholar. "I figured I'd make the transition in my 40s, and that is what happened."

Novak, whose wife Melva is a French teacher at a local yeshiva, was able to make the transition to academia partly because his children were already full-grown and independent. Jacob, 30, is a CNN producer. Marianne, 33, is a lawyer.

David Novak

Although Novak is still an American citizen, he and his wife are in the process of acquiring dual citizenship. Currently, they are permanent residents of Canada.

"I came here for two reasons." Novak said. "The University of Toronto offered me a fantastic position, and the city was a big attraction."

The author of 11 books on topics ranging from law and theology to Jewish political theory, Novak teaches courses on Jewish ethics, the history of Judaism and modern Jewish philosophy at both the under-graduate and graduate levels.

Jewish studies, he noted, has come a long way in the last 30 years. "When I was a student, there were virtually no Jewish studies."

Novak, who describes himself as socially conservative and politically liberal, gives a private weekly class in Talmud and officiates at occasional weddings. "That makes me feel rabbinical," he quipped.

A member of the Orthodox Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, he no longer considers himself a Conservative Jew. "I severed all ties with Conservative Judaism 12 years ago," said Novak, who studied under the eminent thinker Abraham Joshua Heschel.

A founder and vice-president of the Institute of Traditional Judaism, based in Teaneck, New Jersey, he broke with the Jewish Theological Seminary at around the same time. "I'm proud I went there, but it's a different institution today. It's no longer governed by Halachah."

Novak is impressed by the quality of Jewish communal life in Canada, saying it reminds him of Europe. As he put it: "The temptations to assimilate are much less in Canada than in the United States."

Barak halts Waqf's Temple Mount excavations

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak has ordered the police to stop the excavation work that is being carried out by the Wakf and the Israeli Islamic Movement on the Temple Mount.

Barak issued his order after his office received reports that, for the first time in hundreds of years, excavations were being carried out on the raised portion of the Mount, in the area of the Dome of the Rock.

Archeologists and other researchers believe this was the site of the Second Temple, destroyed in 70 CE by the Romans.

The police yesterday instructed the Wakf (the Muslim religious trust) to close a ditch 40 metres long and 70 centimetres deep, which had been dug in the area recently. The Wakf complied, but refused to make any commitments about future work in the area.

The Council for the Prevention of the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount charged yesterday that the state was not doing enough to supervise activities. Barak, on the other hand, denied unauthorized work was taking place on the Temple Mount.

"The prime minister doesn't know what he is talking about," charged archeologist Gabi Barkai. "Large-scale work – some of which was authorized, but most of which was not – has been carried out over the past months in the eastern section of the Temple Mount along the eastern wall, between King Solomon's Stables and Mercy Gate, together with underground work in various other areas of the Mount."

An investigation by Ha'aretz revealed the following:

- Since the Jewish New Year, Sept. 30, 2000, the Antiquities Authority has not supervised activities on the Temple Mount. But in the months prior to the Al Aksa intifadah – which erupted the same day – the Wakf had severely restricted the work of archeologists in the area.
- The Shin Bet security service has relayed information to the prime minister about the long-term plans of the Wakf and the Islamic Movement to start using numerous additional areas on the Mount as mosques. The Shin Bet has also recommended keeping an eye on activities in the area of Mercy Gate, where construction and paving work is being done.
- Some 1,500 tons of earth – and who knows what ancient Jewish objects – have been removed from the Temple Mount without first being examined by archeologists, and hauled by truck to undisclosed sites.
- In recent months, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and the Antiquities Authority have protested to Barak that the Wakf was being allowed to continue its excavation work without supervision and contrary to the law. Barak rejected these protests and authorized the Wakf to carry out paving work at the site.
- Barak prevented the Jerusalem Municipality from sending inspectors to the Temple Mount to investigate alleged infringements by the excavations of the planning and building laws.
- Police have not implemented the recommendations of security elements to prevent heavy excavation machinery from entering the site and to stop trucks from removing earth filled with archeological findings from the Temple Mount.
- The Archeology Council has voiced its protests to the prime minister a number of times in recent months, urging he "ensure that the issue of the preservation of antiquities from the area of the Temple Mount receive top priority."

Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami told the cabinet last Sunday that arrangements are being made to allow Antiquities Authority officials to visit the Temple Mount to see whether artifacts and precious archeological finds had been destroyed at the site.

Ben-Ami added that he had asked the police commissioner and the police commanders in the area to look into the matter, and that according to their reports, the Wakf had not expanded its work at the site.

MK Shaul Yahalom (National Religious Party) called for a 24-hour-a-day police and security force presence on the Temple Mount and the arrest of members of the Wakf who were "desecrating antiquities at the site in an effort to wipe out the traces of the Jewish nation from its most sacred site."

The Mufti of Jerusalem, Akrameh Sabri, insisted the Temple Mount area contained no remnants related to Jewish history.

Last weekend, a group of public figures, intellectuals and archeologists sent a sharp letter of protest to Prime Minister Ehud Barak condemning what they said were serious violations by the Wakf on the Temple Mount site that endanger important archeological evidence.

The letter, signed by authors A.B. Yehoshua, Haim Guri, S. Izhar and some of the most senior archeologists in Israel, noted that in recent weeks more than 1,500 tons of rubble had been removed from the site by tractors and loaded on to trucks to be dumped at undisclosed sites.

"It is unacceptable," the signatories wrote, "that in a culturally enlightened and law abiding country, someone can authorize such a serious crime, of such enormous proportions, to carry on for more than a year. This is what has been going on at the Temple Mount for the past 15 months, causing unprecedented damage to the most important archeological site in the country, and causing irreparable damage to rare archeological evidence… at one of the rarest cultural legacies in the world."

The signatories added that "senior security sources" told them the purpose of the Wakf's work is to build more mosques on every available space of the Temple Mount, thus turning the area into one enormous mosque that would preclude any Jewish presence at the site.

The group, which watches developments at the Temple Mount, said this is a similar project to the building of two underground mosques in the area known as Solomon's Stables.

'Marathon' talks begin in Taba

Ben-Eliezer, the communications minister, said the talks are "a loaded gun" pointed at Israel. He said the timing is wrong and they risk causing diplomatic and ethical damage.

"We have no reason to go there [Taba]," Ben-Eliezer said. "The Palestinians will use the timing of the talks to squeeze more compromises out of Israel."

Itzik, the environment minister, said it would be very difficult to reach any sort of agreement in the remaining 10 days, and it is inappropriate to hold talks so close to an election for prime minister.

She also warned that the Israeli public is confused. "The nation wants to know where it is heading and whether we are negotiating with the Palestinians under fire," she said.

Barak, although not optimistic about making substantial gains in the Taba talks, said, "If we manage to get something along the lines of the Clinton proposals, this will constitute a significant watershed."

He said the government had a responsibility to continue seeking results from the peace process "to the last days before the election." Justice Minister Yossi Beilin and Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami expressed their support for Barak.

The government also unanimously supported the red lines set for the negotiations – Israel will not accept a right of return within the Green Line; the prime minister will not sign any document transferring sovereignty over Temple Mount to the Palestinians; and under any agreement, 80 percent of the settlers will remain under Israeli sovereignty.

The prime minister said he had informed Bill Clinton of these principles in a message he sent on Friday and in a telephone conversation.

Meanwhile, a security meeting between Palestinian and Israeli officials concluded yesterday with no significant results. While acknowledging that shooting incidents in the territories have dropped dramatically, the Israelis accused the Palestinian Authority (PA) of not doing enough to stop terrorist attacks.

The meeting was held at the District Co-ordination Office north of Ramallah. Minister Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, Shin Bet head Avi Dichter and several IDF officers represented Israel; Saeb Erekat, and several leading PA security officials, took part as the PA delegation.

The PA delegates presented data showing that shooting incidents decreased 70 percent during the past week in the West Bank, and 50 percent in the Gaza Strip.

In exchange for this, they demanded that Israel ease various security measures, starting with the internal closure that has been enforced in West Bank areas. Israel accepted the data on gunfire but charged that the PA has not resumed security co-operation aimed at halting attacks.

EU cancels Cairo meet as Israel barred

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union cancelled its sponsorship and financing of an economic conference of European and Mediterranean chambers of commerce, which had been scheduled for earlier this week in Cairo, because its Egyptian organizers refused to invite Israeli delegates.

The EU pull-out led to cancellation of the event, which was part of the "Barcelona process" framework involving EU members and Middle Eastern states and designed to enhance European-Mediterranean co-operation.

The original conference announcement included the names of members of the Israel Chamber of Commerce. But as the date of the conference approached, the Israeli names were dropped from the invitation.

Israel's Foreign Ministry lodged protests with EU offices in Brussels and elsewhere. After confirming that Egypt's Chamber of Commerce would not reverse its refusal to invite the Israelis, the EU revoked its sponsorship and financing of the conference.

French banks pledge funds to Holocaust victims

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Just days before the new Bush administration came into office, an agreement was signed in Washington requiring seven French banks to pay millions of dollars to Jews whose money was seized in the Holocaust.

The pact, signed last week by the United States and France, would compensate Jews whose bank accounts were confiscated during France's collaborationist Vichy regime. Some 80,000 such accounts were frozen or seized in France during World War II.

Under the agreement, France pledged to create two compensation funds. One would contain roughly $50 million – an amount that could go up or down depending on the amount of claims; and a fund fixed at $22.5 million.

The larger fund will pay Holocaust victims whose claims have firm documentation. The smaller fund will pay those unable to produce documentation but are believed to be owed money.

The agreement stemmed from two lawsuits filed in the United States in 1997 by Holocaust survivors and heirs to recover confiscated funds. The suits targeted French banks operating in the early 1940s, including major banks like Societe Generale and Credit Lyonnais.

Under the agreement, survivors and their heirs will drop their lawsuits and submit claims for repayment from the funds. A commission will decide the amount of compensation.

Syrian Jewish treasures at home in Israel

JERUSALEM — A collection of Jewish holy objects smuggled out of Syria with help from Canadian Judy Feld Carr was displayed for the first time recently.

The objects, including ancient Bible manuscripts, were exhibited at Beit Hanasi, the residence of President Moshe Katsav.

The collection comprised nine ancient Bible manuscripts (codices), about 40 Torah scrolls, along with 32 decorative boxes in which the scrolls are stored, and some 100 rare European prayer books that had been used in Syrian congregations.

Included were the storied Damascus Keter (codex) and the last Torah scroll of the synagogue in Aleppo. The keter had been smuggled from Syria to Carr in Toronto. She presented it to the chief rabbi of Syria, Avraham Hamra, upon his arrival in Israel in 1994. The Aleppo Torah, written on deerskin, was displayed at the museum in Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation in 1993 before Carr took it to Israel.

Carr was unable to attend the exhibit. But late last month in Jerusalem, Israel's former consul general to Toronto, Jehudi Kinar, arranged a meeting between her and Katsav at the presidential residence.

For now, the artifacts are being kept at Hebrew University's Jewish National and University library, where the codices had been brought for cleaning and restoration. Officials plan a permanent home for them in a future centre for the study and preservation of the Syrian Jewish tradition, to be established in Holon.

The 100 or so prayer books, some of them printed in Venice, Naples and Amsterdam, were also smuggled to Toronto, in three stages, inside boxes of candy and cookies. Israel's consulate then shipped them to Jerusalem.

Carr, known to thousands of Syrian Jews simply as "Mrs. Judy," led a highly secret one-woman operation for over 20 years to spirit Jews out of Syria. Funds raised mainly in Toronto were used to quietly bribe Syrian officials, buy travel documents and alleviate the plight of Jewish prisoners.

In all, Carr helped 3,228 Syrian Jews leave the country, most recently last March, when bribe money was needed to help two infant girls leave with their mother.

Today, there are 38 Jews left in Syria, all in Damascus.

Some of the scrolls and books had been smuggled out by way of France and Turkey, sometimes by Jews who managed to escape across the Turkish border, and sometimes by tourists.

Among those attending the exhibit were the Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron; Rabbi Hamra; Prof. Sara Japhet, director of the Jewish National and University Library; and leaders of the Syrian Jewish community in Israel.

Advice to Bush: reassess 'Oslo'

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A special presidential study group sponsored by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy is recommending that the incoming Bush administration "assess lessons of the Oslo experience" and "explore alternative paths to peace" between Israel and the Palestinians.

The study stresses that "there is no strategic alternative to the diplomatic process, for either Palestinians or Israelis," but adds that "there are, however, different paths the parties could take to achieve progress toward peace."

The 52-member panel that composed the study includes both Democrats and Republicans, as well as various Middle East experts.

The study concludes that "the top Middle East priority for a new president is to prevent a descent to regional war. The current fighting between Israelis and Palestinians could degenerate into wider regional war either through design or miscalculation."

The formula proposed for deterring regional war includes three "ingredients":

• Affirming the "unwritten" alliance with Israel.

• Work with key Arab moderates (especially Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, and Morocco) to encourage acts of public and private leadership in support of the peace process.

• Deterring adversaries, current and potential. Make sure that Syria's new leader, Bashar Assad, understands that emboldening Hezbollah into military actions against Israel could provoke a wider regional confrontation in which Syria itself would receive the brunt of Israeli retaliation.

Baghdad must also understand that the United States will orchestrate political and perhaps military responses should Iraq seek to intervene in the Arab-Israeli conflict, to bully or blackmail regional players like Jordan into adopting more obstructionist positions, or to exploit the current situation for military advantage elsewhere, such as in northern Iraq.

The week in Israel

Jan. 15

• Israel was reported to be considering severing all ties with the U.S.-led commission probing the outbreak of violence in the territories because a team working for the commission visited the Temple Mount without prior co-ordination with Israel, despite an agreement. (Subsequently, Israel did suspend contact with the commission.)

Jan. 16

• Israel is setting up a task force to help combat AIDS and malaria in Africa.

Jan. 17

• A 16-year-old from Ashkelon, Ophir Rahum, was murdered in Ramallah, shot seven times, after he was enticed into the area to meet a Palestinian woman he met through the Internet. On Tuesday, the young man left his home with a large sum of money and without telling his parents he was going to Ramallah. (The IDF subsequently apprehended a woman suspected of luring Rahum and a number of Fatah agents suspected in the actual murder.)

Jan. 18

• MK Dan Meridor (Center party) said he will support Likud candidate Ariel Sharon in the election for prime minister on Feb. 6. Meridor said his support for Sharon is based on his opposition to Prime Minister Ehud Barak's policies regarding the Palestinians.

Jan. 19

• Shimon Peres continues to prevent Barak from getting better ratings in opinion polls, according to sources affiliated with Barak. The sources maintain that until Peres "makes an unequivocal" declaration that he does not intend to run in the upcoming election, the 18-20 percent gap in the opinion polls between Barak and Ariel Sharon will not diminish.

Between Iraq and a hard place

What happens when the cold, hard reality of fact and logic comes up against an immovable ideological force? Occasionally sparks fly. Which they did in abundance on the riveting Jan. 16 episode of Newsworld's Counterspin.

Marking the 10th anniversary of the U.S./UN-led assault to force Iraq out of Kuwait, Counterspin featured a wide array of experts on the subject of "what now?"

Focussing on the humanitarian aspect of the sanctions question, host Avi Lewis tried to downplay Saddam Hussein's continuing military threat. Lewis claimed that "we don't know" about Saddam's infamous stockpile of weapons of mass destruction.

Former chief UN arms inspector Richard Butler agreed that the sanctions have failed, but quickly became annoyed when Lewis refused to see past the sanctions and acknowledge the military danger Saddam poses.

Frank Gafney of the Centre for Security Policy claimed that it is Saddam, not the sanctions, who is hurting the Iraqi people by depriving them of billions of oil-for-food-and-medicine dollars. He shared Butler's frustration over Lewis' apparent naiveté. Gafney opposed lifting sanctions and allowing the Russians, Chinese and French to sell Saddam weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles.

Lewis insisted that "some million and a half people have died in the last 10 years… because of sanctions." An exasperated Butler interjected: "Avi… I find the persistence… of pointing out everyone in the world's fault except Saddam's ludicrously unbalanced. I mean ludicrously and dangerously unbalanced."

Even by appealing to the "black-and-white-on-the-page fact" that the lifting of sanctions depended on Saddam's allowing disarmament to be completed, Butler could not convince Lewis. When Lewis said that blaming Saddam is a line "we've heard for 10 years," a frustrated Butler pleaded: "Does that make it not true?"

Lewis was unmoved. To his credit he allowed Butler the final word, and, ever smiling, turned to his audience.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Chilly winter shouldn't stop you from exercising

According to Canada's Physical Activity Guide, physical inactivity is as dangerous to our health as smoking. Unfortunately, our miserable winter weather is conducive to sitting indoors and huddling by the TV. Nothing could be more detrimental to our mental and physical well-being.

Here are some tips from the experts at Health Canada: Add up your activities during the day in periods of at least 10 minutes each. Start slowly and build up. If you're already doing some light activities, move up to more moderate ones. A little is good, but more is better, if you want to achieve health benefits.

Scientists suggest doing 60 minutes of physical activity daily. Time needed depends on effort – as you progress to moderate activities, you can cut down to 30 minutes, four days a week. People think physical activity has to be very hard to improve your health. Not so, say the health professionals.

The goal can be reached by building physical activities into your daily routine. Just add it up in periods of at least 10 minutes daily. After three months of regular physical activity, you will notice a difference – people often say getting started is the hardest part.

Three types of activities are recommended to keep your body healthy: endurance activities, flexibility activities, and strength activities. Do a variety from each group to get the most health benefits.

Endurance activities help your heart, lungs and circulatory system stay healthy and give you more energy. They range from walking and household chores to organized exercise programs and sports.

Naturally, people are limited during the winter in cold climates. However, indoor swimming pools and gyms are easy to find. Furthermore, propelling a wheelchair or walking briskly up and down the corridors of an indoor mall are easily accessible to everyone.

Flexibility activities four to seven days a week will help you move easily, keeping muscles relaxed and joints mobile. Regular flexibility activities can help you live better and longer, so that your quality of life and independence are maintained as you age. Flexibility activities include gentle reaching, bending and stretching of all your muscle groups.

Here are some ideas that can be followed regardless of weather conditions: Join the Jewish Community Centre or other exercise venues for classes in yoga, T'ai Chi, stretching exercises. A good social activity such as curling, bowling and dancing may also work for you. Believe it or not, mopping the floor and vacuuming are even listed in the Canadian guide.

Strength activities should be on the healthy exercise list at least two days a week. Strength activities help your muscles and bones stay strong, improve your posture and help prevent diseases like osteoporosis. Strength activities are those that make you work your muscles against some kind of resistance, like when you push or pull a hard to open, heavy door.

To ensure good overall strength, try to do a combination of activities that exercise the muscles in your arms, mid-section, and legs. Strive for a good balance — upper body and lower body, right and left sides, and opposing muscle groups (e.g., both the front and back of the upper arm). Here are some examples:

- climbing stairs;
- doing exercises like abdominal curls and push-ups;
- wearing a backpack;
- doing weigh/strength-training routines.

Safe strength training

Start with five minutes of light endurance activity and stretching at the beginning of each session. Learn proper techniques to protect your back and joints from undue stress. Use weights and high repetitions (two to four sets of 10-15 repetitions of each exercise). Breathe regularly when doing an exercise — don't hold your breath. Rest for at least one day between strength-training sessions. Get help from an experienced leader or consult a reputable book for information.

For more information, call toll-free: 1-888-334-9769 or Activate Canada's Physical Activity Guide Web site at www.paguide.com. As the experts at Health Canada say: "Think of minutes of physical activity as dollars in your health bank and make an investment in your health today."

Blood test proposed to diagnose schizophrenia

REHOVOT, Israel — A relatively simple blood test for diagnosing schizophrenia has been proposed by researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science.

The study, conducted by Prof. Sara Fuchs and graduate student Tal Ilani of the immunology department, was published on Jan. 16 in the proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences in the United States.

Schizophrenia, which affects about one percent of the population, is characterized by disturbances in emotional functioning, perception of reality and thought processes.

Because the biological basis of schizophrenia is still a mystery, diagnosis is based on psychiatric and behavioural assessment. Nevertheless, numerous research findings suggest a possible connection between the disease and an excessive activity of dopamine, a chemical messenger, or neurotransmitter, involved in communication between nerve cells in the brain.

This activity is dependent, among other factors, on the number of dopamine receptors on the surface of nerve cells. Postmortem studies of the brains of schizophrenic patients, as well as PET scans of the brains of live patients, have suggested that the number of these receptors is increased in schizophrenia.

Theoretically, then, it would be possible to diagnose the disease by measuring this number. Unfortunately, however, it is impossible to assess the number and location of dopamine receptors in the brains of live schizophrenic patients with sufficient precision.

In their study, Fuchs and Ilani propose a way of getting around this problem. They suggest evaluating the presence of dopamine receptors on the surface of white blood cells called lymphocytes as a potential diagnostic test for schizophrenia.

To examine this possibility, the scientists compared blood samples taken from people with schizophrenia in psychiatric hospitals in Israel with blood samples from healthy individuals.

Since identifying dopamine receptors on the surface of white blood cells is extremely difficult, Fuchs and Ilani focused on an earlier stage in receptor formation – the stage at which messenger RNA molecules convey the genetic information needed for making dopamine receptors from the cell nucleus to the ribosome, the small cellular "factory" where the receptors are manufactured.

A statistical analysis showed that the blood of patients with schizophrenia contains, on average, 3.6 times more messenger RNA molecules of dopamine receptors of a particular kind, called D3, than the blood of healthy people. The high levels were observed in patients treated with a variety of drugs, as well as in patients who received no medications.

On the basis of these findings, Fuchs and Ilani propose to use the blood test determining the levels of mRNA that encode D3 receptors on the membranes of white blood cells as a test for schizophrenia.

The research team also included Dr. Dorit Ben-Shachar from the Rambam Medical Center and B. Rappaport Faculty of Medicine at the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology, Drs. Rael D. Strous and Moshe Kotler of Beer Yaakov Mental Health Center, and Drs. Marina Mazor and Ala Sheinkman of the Mental Health Center in Tirat Hacarmel, Haifa.

Fuchs holds the Professor Ernst B. Chain Chair of Neuro-Immunology. Her research is supported by the Abramson Family Foundation, the Wood-Byer Foundation, the Crown Endowment Fund for Immunological Research, the Irwin Green Research Fund in the Neurosciences, the Levine Center for Applied Research, the Edward D. and Anna Mitchell Research Fund and the Cemach and Anna Oiserman Research Fund.

Book examines city's Jewish community

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Etan Diamond, an American academic, has written a full-length study of the Orthodox Jewish community of Toronto and its pioneering movement northward from the inner city into the suburbs in the postwar era.

Published recently by the University of North Carolina Press, Diamond's And I Will Dwell in Their Midst: Orthodox Jews in Suburbia devotes some 200 pages to tracing the development of the significantly-Jewish Bathurst Street corridor, focusing on synagogues, schools, kosher supermarkets, bakeries, restaurants, gift shops and other Jewish establishments.

Collectively, such places have stamped a Jewish character onto north Bathurst Street, creating what Diamond calls a "sacred space" that helps to enhance the Orthodox community's cohesiveness and sense of identity.

A senior research associate at the Polish Center at Indiana University-Purdue University in Indianapolis, Diamond lived in Toronto for three years in the mid-1990s while researching the book as part of his doctoral thesis; his wife and her family are native Torontonians. Upon attaining his degree, he spent another four years expanding his study and preparing it for publication.

"Toronto is very representative of the story I was trying to tell in regard to the geographic migration of the Jews, their progression from urban downtown spaces into suburbia," Diamond said while signing books recently at the Negev Importing Co., on north Bathurst Street.

According to Diamond, the Jewish movement northward into new subdivisions during the period of great suburban expansion amounted to a sort of quantum leap of faith. At first glance, the vast commercial expanses and over-arching consumerist ethic of suburbia seem entirely at odds with the spiritual values of Judaism, he said.

"It had always been assumed that Jews were somehow urban people. They had always been associated with urban spaces. Now they were saying, 'We're going to move to the suburbs and have our big houses and lawns, but we'll all live near each other and still keep kosher and maintain our Judaism…

"One of the big surprises of my research was the extent to which there was an awareness, particularly in The Canadian Jewish News in the 1960s when it all started, that the movement up Bathurst Street was something historic and important."

Much of the author's research was conducted at the Ontario Jewish Archives, examining synagogue records and reading back issues of The CJN and the Jewish Standard. He also consulted property records and interviewed more than a dozen Torontonians.

Several of his subjects described the experience of moving, four or five decades ago, into newly-built houses on streets in the wilds of North York, adjacent to farms and accessible only by unimproved roads. Others recalled the early days of synagogues such as Shaarei Shomayim, whose congregants, seeing the writing on the wall, transplanted themselves northward and broke ground on the present Glencairn Avenue building in 1964.

Still others recalled erecting new synagogues in stages, starting with the social hall, and adding the religious sanctuary as funds became available. That model of pioneering has been refined and accelerated to the point where, in the 1990s, developer Joseph Tanenbaum could build a neighbourhood in Thornhill and erect the mammoth Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation practically in a single swipe.

Diamond documents the Jewish community's unusual "hyper-linear" evolution along Bathurst Street, and concludes that other areas of settlement, such as on north Bayview Avenue, never reached the same level of concentration.

"Everybody knows Bathurst Street. You just have to say the word and everyone understands it. All of Jewish life happens in and around Bathurst Street: it's the icon of Toronto Jewry. If you meet someone in Israel and you tell them you're from Toronto, they'll say, 'Oh, Bathurst Street.'"

Several maps, tables and historic photographs add to the book's interest. A sketch map chronologically outlines seven stages of the Jewish community's development: Kensington Market (1900 to 1960), Forest Hill (1930 to 1950), Lawrence Manor and Clanton Park (1950s), Bathurst Manor (1960s), Bathurst Village (1960s to 1970s), the Bayview-Leslie area (1970s to 1990s) and Thornhill (1970s to 1990s).

A pair of photos are offered, taken from an identical location – Bathurst, looking north from Drewry – in 1958 and again in 1999; obviously, there's a world of difference between the two. For Torontonians of a certain age, the book is certain to bring back memories and stories of the rugged pioneering days of yesteryear.

Published in softcover, And I Will Dwell in Their Midst: Orthodox Jews in Suburbia is available in bookstores for $31.25.

Jewish Film Society keeps going strong after 23 years

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As much effort has been put into finding the right speakers to discuss the eight films in the current season of the Toronto Jewish Film Society (TJFS) as into selecting them, says the society's chair, Barbara Coven.

For example, the next film, on Sunday, Feb. 18, is an episode of the TV series Gunsmoke, an unusual take on the Jews of the late 1800s as they made their way west in the United States.

The show chronicles the murder of a Jew, and the attempt of his younger brother (played by a young Richard Dreyfuss) to seek revenge by taking the law into his own hands. His father, who knows the killer, cites talmudic precedent in refusing to give evidence against him, leaving a U.S. marshall (James Arness) completely baffled.

"We know this [film] opens up a controversy over ethics, and the committee has chosen Rabbi Edward Elkin of the First Narayever Congregation and lawyer Richard Shekter to be on a panel moderated by Marc Glassman following the film," Coven said.

This is the formula for success that the TJFS, now in its 23rd year, used in its first presentation on Jan. 14 of a Bulgarian film, After the End of the World, which drew packed houses for its two showings at Jackman Hall in the Art Gallery of Ontario. The hall, which has hosted the society for the past six years, seats 201.

Introducing the film, and answering questions later, was Christina Stojanova, a native of Bulgaria and a professor of film at York University.

"We try not to show films which have appeared at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival or are available on TV," said Coven.

The society has grown in membership (at $50 a year) from 45 to over 350. One Sunday a month, the society holds showings at 5:15 pm. and 7:45 p.m.; it keeps 20 seats per showing for the general public.

This season, the TJFS is exhibiting films from Israel, France, the United Kingdom, Bulgaria, Germany/Netherlands and the United States.

From Israel comes White Lies (March 18), dealing with an Israeli playwright who comes home from Paris, unable to tell his mother that she has terminal cancer. Dr. Miriam Devinsky will introduce the film and touch on the questions it raises in the discussion period.

On June 10, in a co-presentation with The Friends of Yiddish, the society will show the Yiddish classic, The Singing Blacksmith, with English sub-titles.

Reflecting its determination to work with other community groups, the TJFS, in a co-presentation with the Goethe-Institut, will screen Karussell Nov. 4, during Holocaust Education week. The film was made by Kurt Gerron, a compatriot of Kurt Weill and Bertolt Brecht, and a star of The Threepenny Opera who sang Mack the Knife.

"What we are doing is showing not only Karussell but also The Fuhrer Gives a City to the Jews, which Gerron was forced to make as a Nazi propaganda film about Theresienstadt," Coven said. " Later the Nazis killed Gerron. We wanted to show what he was capable of doing, in its proper context."

The TJFS is based in the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC), which handles its administration.

"We consider the society a model for good programming," said Bill Emery, executive director of the Bloor JCC. "We rely on the expertise of the committee to choose good films."

Businessman opens art school for seniors with different levels of experience

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Al Green – self-made successful businessman, developer and artist/scuptor – is a man who, above all, wants to share his success with the community.

One of Green's most recent altruistic ventures is the establishment of the City Sculpture School and Studio, an adult sculpture and art school and studio for individuals, generally over 50.

Opened last summer, the school was created for people with different levels of artistic experience, from beginners to accomplished sculptors.

Green, 75, owner of Greenwin Developments, began sculpting for recreation 30 years ago. For the past 10 years, he has pursued sculpting seriously.

A sculpture of his father's head is prominently displayed at the Lipa Green Building, the building he and his brother Harold built in memory of their father.

Green's pieces are in private collections and public institutions throughout Canada and the United States, including sculptures at the Yonge-Eglinton Centre, the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Temple Sinai, two synagogues in Hamilton and many other venues.

"It occurred to me that there were many adults and seniors with time on their hands looking for creative things to do," Green said.

His new permanent studio and school is located in Greenwin Square Mall at 345 Bloor St. E. and has indoor parking.

"I enjoy sculpting and it has given me so much pleasure that I wanted to share it with others," Green said. "My philosophy is, do it now. If you have a good idea, a solid plan, a real need and you can make it happen, then make it happen."

Green lit up with enthusiasm as he described the works of the students. Many are retired and have never attempted sculpture before.

A gallery at the entrance of the City Sculpture School and Studio is presently exhibiting works by Green, Sorel Etrog, Maryon Kantaroff, Morton Katz and Lorne Winters. These well-known artists participate in the teaching program at the studio.

A unique feature of the facility is that "Students can drop in any time to work on a piece and stay as long as they want, and there is usually someone there to assist," Green said.

The City Sculpture School and Studio is a non-profit organization and membership is open to the community. A trial month costs $195 and a year's membership costs $1,200. Tools are provided.

The Al and Malka Green Foundation subsidizes the costs of operating the school that these fees do not cover.

Green says his love of sculpting travels with him. He has a studio in his Toronto home and in his Florida condominium. For more information on the City Sculpture School and Studio, call 416-963-9909 or e-mail director@cityscsulpture.net.

RABBI GOLDSTEIN READS AT BOOKS & BAGELS EVENT

At the next instalment of the Bloor JCC's popular Books & Bagels Sunday morning reading series, Toronto Rabbi Elyse Goldstein reads from and discusses The Woman's Torah Commentary, a new book that she edited.

Rabbi Goldstein is the director of Kolel: a Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, the adult education institute of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism. Her first book, ReVisions: Seeing Torah Through a Feminist Lens (Key Porter) won a Canadian Jewish Book Award last year and also a prize from the Independent Booksellers Association.

Published by Jewish Lights, The Woman's Torah Commentary is an anthology of 54 different female rabbis writing on the weekly Torah portions. Contributors include the first women rabbis of the Conservative, Reconstruction and Reform movements.

Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. W. Sunday, Jan. 28, 11 a.m. Members free, non-members $8. Includes coffee, bagels and cream cheese. 416-924-6211.

Spertus Competition: Entry guidelines are available for the next instalment of the Spertus Prize, a biennial, juried competition for the creation of Jewish ceremonial art, sponsored by the Spertus Museum in Chicago.

The contest is open to artists of all religions and nationalities; two Torontonians won the previous first prize. The winner receives $10,000. The focus of the upcoming competition is the mezuzah. The deadline for entries is Dec. 28.

For guidelines, write to: Spertus Prize Competition, 618 South Michigan Ave., Chicago, Il., 60605. Fax: 312-922-3034; e-mail: musm@spertus.edu.

Ballet Open House: The National Ballet of Canada opens its doors for an afternoon of exploration for all ages. Visitors may watch a rehearsal and meet dancers, inspect costumes, wigs, props and set models, tour the wardrobe and the rest of the facilities. Face painting and dress-up are among the activities in a Kids' Studio.

The Esso Kids Open House, Sunday, Jan. 28, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Free; no reservations required. 470 Queens Quay W. (west of Spadina). 416-345-9686, ext. 317.

Arts Briefs

• Paintings by John Doyle are on view Jan. 20 through Feb. 8. Gallery One, 121 Scollard St. 416-929-3103.

• The Civic Light Opera Company presents the Rodgers and Hammerstein musical The King and I. Feb. 15 to 24, Fairview Library Theatre. Adults $15. 416-203-7839.

•Laura Sky's 70-minute breast cancer documentary How Can We Love You: Behind the Scenes with the Play, Handle With Care will be shown free at the Ontario Science Centre's Imperial Oil Auditorium Jan. 28 at 7 p.m.

The aim is to support and inform women with breast cancer and the people who care for them.

Passages: Hollywood screenwriter Julius Epstein, who wrote and co-wrote more than 50 screenplays including Casablanca, died recently in Los Angeles at the age of 91.

A child of Russian-Jewish immigrants who grew up on New York's Lower East Side, Epstein was hired as a ghostwriter for $25 a week in the early 1930s, and began collaborating with his twin brother Philip Epstein on screenplays in 1934. Besides Casablanca, the brothers' most famous works are The Man Who Came to Dinner (1941), Yankee Doodle Dandy (1942) and Arsenic and Old Lace (1944); all were adapted from stage plays. Julius survived nearly half a century after his brother's premature death from cancer in 1952.

Known for his wisecracking sense of humour, Epstein added several choice phrases to the language, including "Play it again, Sam" (typically misquoted), as well as "Round up the usual suspects" and "I'm shocked to learn that gambling is going on in this casino."

He never won an Oscar, but his screenplay for Pete 'n' Tillie, based on the book by Peter de Vries, won a best screenplay award in 1972.

Diverse attractions and activities in the Bahamas

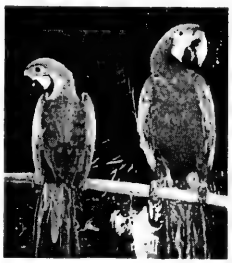
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

BAHAMAS — The Bahamas, 700 islands situated in the Atlantic Ocean, stretch almost 1,000 kilometres, from the eastern coast of Florida to the southeastern tip of Cuba.

All 30 of the inhabited islands are unique and charming, including Grand Bahama Island; Providence Island, home to Bahama's capital, Nassau; Paradise Island, linked by High Arch Bridge to Providence Island and home of the mega-resort Atlantis; and Harbour Island, famous for its three-mile pink sand beach.

For years, Canadians have been flocking to Freeport City/Lucaya on Grand Bahama Island, an island which offers its guests a host of activities and attractions.

Eco-lovers should not miss the 40-acre Lucayan National Park, home to the largest explored underwater cave in the world. Parrot Jungle's Garden of the Groves, created by developer Wallace Groves, consists of a 12-acre botanical garden, four cascading waterfalls, an alligator exhibit, exotic birds and a petting zoo.



To learn about Grand Bahama Island from top to bottom, travel with East End Adventures in open 4X4s and by the sea with Kayak Nature Tours.

Not to be missed is The Dolphin Experience at Sanctuary Bay. In The Close Encounter, you can talk with dolphin trainers, and then stand in waist deep water to allow the pod of Atlantic bottlenose dolphins to come up and touch you. Also offered are programs called Swim With The Dolphins and an all-day Assistant Trainer Program.

Other notable activities on Grand Bahama Island include shopping for souvenirs at the International Bazaar, gambling at the casino at Bahamia and enjoying the colourful nightlife filled with local flavoured entertainment at a number of bars and resorts, including the luxurious Our Lucayan.

Grand Bahama Island is home to the only synagogue in the Bahamas, The Luis de Torres Freeport Hebrew Congregation, located on East Sunrise Highway and surrounded by churches.

Besides dropping your coins at the casino at Atlantis, you can be kept pretty busy in Nassau/Paradise Island, less than an hour's plane ride from Grand Bahama Island aboard Bahamasair.

Points of interest include a scary walk through a museum called The Pirates of Nassau and the Doongalik Studios. The studio has historic buildings, an art gallery, sculptures and costume displays from the Junkanoo Festival, a carnival held annually on Dec. 26 and Jan. 1 on the islands.

Ardasta Gardens has a small zoo with native iguanas, monkeys, snakes and rare birds, but the main attraction is the flamingos on parade – long pink legs choreographed in unison.

Great photos can be taken from the highest point in Nassau, the water tank at Fort Fincastle and at The Dig At Atlantis, an elaborate recreation of the underwater and lost city of Atlantis.

If the excitement of Paradise Island is too much, head over on the Bahamas Fast Ferry for a two-hour boat ride to Harbour Island or "Briland" as the locals call it, situated one mile off the northern coast of the Bahamas' island of Eleuthra. There isn't too much to do on Briland and that suits visitors wanting rest and relaxation just fine.

A great way to discover this two-mile long, half-a-mile wide picturesque landscape is by golf cart. Four- and six-seater carts are readily available for rent at the ferry docks or through local hotels.

Harbour Island's first major settlement, named after the 18th-century royal governor of the islands, Lord Dunmore, was the original capital of the Bahamas.

If you can tear yourself away from the beach, you'll discover pastel coloured board homes edged by white picket fences and tropical flowers.

The Plateau and the Arch, both giant coral structures densely populated with marine life, are a natural magnet for serious divers from around the world.

You could do Harbour Island in a day or stay over at one of the intimate resorts including the Romora Bay Club, Pink Sands or Coral Sands.

Bahamas' Ministry of Tourism provides a wonderful way to experience the Bahamian way of life with its People To People program, recently featured on CNN. Visitors travelling with or without families are matched with volunteers of similar ages and with similar interests for day or evening activities that can include boating, fishing, shopping at the local outdoor market, taking a "back-street-tour" or attending an impromptu party at their hosts' home.

For more information on the Bahamas, including the People To People program, check out the Ministry of Tourism Web site at www.bahamas.com.

Olympic coach trains fighters at Bathurst JCC

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There was a time in Canadian sports history when Jews were among the top boxers in the game. Sammy Luftspring, Maxie Berger, "Baby" Yack and Albert Roher were among the more notable Jewish practitioners of the sweet science.

In the Former Soviet Union (FSU), it was pretty much the same, only more so. National champions who were Jewish abounded, including Leo Segilovitch, Leonid Shenkman, Leonid Bogouslovsky, Vladimir Kogan and Yakov Brown. In the 1950s, during the heyday of Soviet boxing, hardly a year would go by without a Jew rising to the national championship in one weight division or another, said Boris Gitman, himself the 1952 lightweight champion of Ukraine.

Becoming the best in the FSU was no mean feat when you consider that at the sport's peak, there were more than 350,000 registered boxers and more than 12,000 coaches.

In Canada today, there are only three full-time coaches, Gitman said.

Boxing today ain't what it used to be, either here or in Russia, but that doesn't mean it's extinct. Gitman, for seven years national coach of the FSU, has a stable of fighters he trains regularly at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (JCC) who rank among the best this country has to offer.

Boris Gitman

Mark Simmons is Canadian and Commonwealth heavyweight champ, silver medalist at the 1999 Pan Am Games and a finalist at the 1997 World Championships.

Troy Amos Ross is Canadian light-heavyweight champion, silver medalist at the 1997 Commonwealth Games and a bronze medalist at the 1999 Pan Am games. Both Amos and Simmons were members of Canada's Olympic team at Sydney.

Gurik Kagramaniants, a 16-year-old junior, is Ontario bantamweight champion and is ranked second nationally.

Eugene Bloomenfeld, the only Jewish fighter in the bunch, is an up-and-comer and, though unranked, has the potential to be a national light-middleweight champion, Gitman believes.

The fighters meet three times a week at the JCC where Gitman puts them through their paces, letting them spar lightly, while trying to impart the strategic and tactical elements that go into making a top fighter.

It's something Gitman has done with hundreds of boxers all around the world in a coaching career that has spanned about 40 years. In the system perfected in the FSU, boxing was seen as a science – if not the "sweet science" of local fight aficionados.

"It's not just technique," said Gitman who works part time in the JCC health club. "You must know body structure, physiology and psychology."

Like other coaches in the FSU, Gitman studied at university, where the subject matter went way beyond the jab and the uppercut. Courses in physiology, anatomy, biomechanics, biochemistry and sports history were all on the curriculum.

There were 17 physical education and sports universities in the FSU, plus faculties of sports in other schools.

At the school Gitman attended in Lvov, Ukraine, military lectures and training were part of the curriculum. By the time he graduated as a master of sport, he had also jumped as a paratrooper.

Graduates were expected to have a working knowledge of many sports beyond their "major." Gitman's specialty was boxing, not too surprising when you consider that he was always a scrapper.

Born in Odessa in 1934, Gitman spent the war years fighting for survival.

"During the war, when we evacuated the Ukraine and anti-Semitism was high among the local people, the Jewish kids would organize," he said. "They were together always and we defended ourselves.

"I fought all my life, for me, my brother and for my friends."

After the war, at age 14, he was introduced to boxing by a youth coach. He loved the sport and embarked on a career that would see him fight 106 times, winning 98.

After studying sports for five years, he was assigned by the authorities – you went where you were told, he explained – to Kishinev, Moldova, to serve as a coach. He spent 12 years in Kishinev, married Inna Greenberg there and was Moldovan boxing champion four or five times.

By the time he was re-assigned to Magadan, in the Siberian wilderness near Alaska, he had assembled a large group of top boxers. "The best I took to Siberia," he said.

Boris Gitman (centre) works with two of his fighters at the Bathurst JCC.

In that remote Siberian outpost over the next 13 years, Gitman recorded his greatest coaching successes.

One of his proteges, featherweight Viktor Ribokov, went on to become European champion four times, Soviet champion eight times and world champion on one occasion.

Another of his boxers, Igor Visotsky, twice beat Cuban Olympic champion Teofilo Stevenson.

In 1980, Gitman left the Soviet Union and, thanks to an offer from local boxing impresario Irv Ungerman, moved to Toronto. By 1982, he was working in the JCC's Nautilus Centre while at the same time trying to get back into the fight game. He sent letters to the International Boxing Association, seeing if he could land a coaching job.

In 1984, he was offered the job of coaching the Jamaican team in the run-up to the Los Angeles Olympics. He grabbed at the offer, but instead of travelling south, he had the Jamaicans come north to train at the Driftwood Community Centre at Jane and Finch. One of his fighters, Dwight Fraser, finished fourth in the welterweight division at the L.A. Games.

That strong showing helped get Gitman his next job. The South Koreans, who were looking for a coach to lead their team into the 1988 Seoul Olympics, made him an offer he couldn't refuse. Gitman moved to South Korea later that year.

"It was an unbelievable opportunity," he said. Five assistants were assigned to him, and "I had 33 boxers in a year-round training camp. Never in my life did I see such facilities as over there."

More importantly, the South Korean boxers were highly disciplined and had been trained to defer to authority. One boxer broke his hand while sparring, but never complained or mentioned it to his coaches, Gitman said. In South Korea, the coach's word was treated as gospel and the boxers would do anything he asked without question.

The hard work and dedication paid off at Seoul where South Korea grabbed three gold medals and lots of others, Gitman recounted, adding that the Koreans never again attained those lofty results.

Back in Toronto, Gitman continued his coaching, training seven fighters he brought over from the FSU. They fought professionally in Toronto, the United States and the Bahamas, winning all their matches.

Last year, Gitman served as one of three coaches with the Canadian team at the Sydney Olympics. Canada's medal-less ring result was widely seen as a major disappointment.

For his part, Gitman is not surprised at Canada's poor record. The difference between the disciplined and obedient Koreans and the Canadians was enormous, he said.

In Sydney, Canadian athletes declined to train, even when their coaches said they should. "The athletes were free to do whatever they wanted. I couldn't believe it… I'm the coach," he said.

Canadian boxers are "nice boxers," very talented, but with no discipline at all, he said.

'Assuring' Israel's existence

A new book, which I have not read but plan to add to the teetering stack on my night table, pinpoints the exact time Jews were "permitted" to exist. The year was 425 CE, not long after Christians slaughtered the Jews of Alexandria in the first recorded pogrom. St. Augustine, among the most influential of the church fathers, issued the following edict with respect to further action against Jews: "Do not slay them."

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

According to James Carroll, author of Constantine's Sword: The Church and the Jews, Augustine's followers put a perverse spin on the order. The Jews, they reasoned, would be permitted to live – but also to suffer. Jews would "be allowed to survive but never to thrive," writes Carroll, a left-leaning Roman Catholic priest, so that their manufactured misery would be "proper punishment for their refusal to recognize the truth of the Church's claims."

Moses Mendelsohn, the 18th-century Jewish philosopher, noted that if not for Augustine's "lovely brainwave, we would have been exterminated long ago." Of course, it also set the stage for two millennia of the most vile Christian anti-Semitism, and provided cover for Torquemada and Hitler.

So we were allowed to exist, if only to be knocked around.

I raise the above in light of the statement issued by the Canadian Council of Churches (CCC) this month on the Middle East. This is not meant to imply the statement in any way sanctions violence against Jews or Israel. It does, however, even in its re-written and disinfected version, sanction mealy-mouthed indifference.

First, the statement's draft version: When Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who chairs the religious and inter-religious affairs committee of Canadian Jewish Congress, examined it, he "saw red," he recalls. For one thing, it called on Jerusalem to be a holy hub for all religions. "The clear implication," Rabbi Bulka says, "is that Jerusalem isn't that now, and hasn't been for the first time in years." The document, he adds, was so incendiary that the United Church of Canada's representative on the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews resigned in protest.

The CCC statement, signed by leaders in the Roman Catholic, United, Anglican, Baptist, Orthodox, Presbyterian, Evangelical Lutheran and Salvation Army denominations, then went back for a re-write. Laudably, Jewish leaders, including CJC, were consulted. A second draft, much more palatable to Jews, was rejected. The third version, issued a month late, omits all reference to Jerusalem, but adds: "A just and durable peace between Israelis and Palestinians is only possible if both states are guaranteed a peaceful existence within secure borders." (A strange turn of words; since when is there a Palestinian "state?") A just and lasting peace "demands the speedy implementation of relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions, the withdrawal of Israel from settlements in Gaza and the West Bank, and the provision of territorial integrity for a Palestinian state."

Israel, meantime, "must also be assured of its right to exist in peace and security within internationally recognized borders. Israel's legitimacy as a contemporary state, long accepted in international law, must also be affirmed within the movements of the region and throughout the world."

While the statement acknowledges the need to resist the promotion of hatred, "wherever it occurs," there's no mention of where it does occur: in Palestinian classrooms, where children as young as three are indoctrinated in hatred of Jews.

There's no mention of Israel's willingness to make dramatic concessions, over and over; no mention of their being spurned, over and over, by the Palestinian "leadership."

But Israel is permitted to exist.

2 HEADS of garlic
4 large Idaho potatoes
8 - 1/2 tsps. olive oil
coarse salt and freshly ground pepper

Heat oven to 300°F. Wrap garlic heads in foil, and roast, about 1 hr. Let stand until cool enough to handle. Slice off tip of each head, just enough to expose cloves; press out garlic in small bowl, using tip of knife to help. Discard garlic skin. Add 4 - 1/2 tsps. olive oil and smash garlic.

Raise oven temp. to 475°F. Peel & slice each potato crosswise into 1" thick pieces. Spread generous amount of paste on each slice; reassemble potato, pressing so potato slices stick together. Set potato on piece of foil; drizzle with 1 tsp. olive oil, add salt & pepper to taste. Wrap potato tightly in foil; repeat process with other potatoes. Bake potatoes in roasting pan or on baking sheet approx. 1 hr & 10 mins, until soft.

Leaders look past election

Barak vows not to join Sharon-led unity government

By YOSSI VERTER
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak said for the first time last weekend that he would not join a national unity government led by Ariel Sharon, since he would find its policies too extremist.

Speaking to a group of writers and performing artists at his official Jerusalem residence, Barak also reiterated that he would not step aside to allow Shimon Peres to run, and indicated that he would not leave politics if defeated on Feb. 6.

Referring to belligerent statements made by Sharon's likely coalition partner, MK Avigdor Lieberman, Barak said that Sharon, if elected, would form a "Tehran-Aswan government." (Lieberman has mentioned the Iranian and Egyptian cities as potential targets for Israeli retaliatory attacks.)

Ehud Barak

Ariel Sharon

Barak expressed confidence that his campaign would coalesce during the last five days before the elections and said the current gap is really less than the surveys indicate.

Meanwhile, Sharon confidants are concerned about hostile responses in the Arab world and beyond, if the Likud candidate is elected. Hoping to ease the transition to power if he wins the election, Sharon is planning to send former United Nations ambassador Dore Gold and former ambassador to Washington Zalman Shoval abroad for consultations in North America and Europe.

Sharon told Channel 2 television news on the weekend that the Palestinians and the Arab states have turned to him and asked him to create "lines of communication [because] in the final analysis, everyone wants to attain peace."

Sharon added that during last week's meeting in Vienna, his three delegates told Yasser Arafat adviser Mohammed Rashid that he wants peace, but will not hold talks while violence continues.

Earthquake victims receive aid

Even as news of the earthquake in India shocked the world, major Canadian Jewish organizations from coast to coast joined in the relief effort for the victims of the earthquake that recently struck El Salvador. Seen above are personnel from Latet (meaning "to give" in Hebrew), the Israeli humanitarian aid organization, loading emergency supplies at Ben-Gurion Airport for delivery in El Salvador. Relief efforts for the victims of the Indian earthquake are now underway in Canada and Israel. Israel announced it has sent a military field hospital and a staff of 165 to India. [Latet photos]

CANADA

Golden Steps Down

TORONTO — Anne Golden, president of United Way of Greater Toronto for 14 years, has left the organization to head the Conference Board of Canada, starting Sept. 30. Under Golden's tenure, United Way grew dramatically and doubled the number of charities it funds. Last month it announced a record $70 million raised in the 2000 campaign.

New Shul Anticipated

VANCOUVER — The Burquest Jewish Community Association, which has been meeting in various venues for 27 years, has closed a deal to take possession of a former Jehovah's Witness meeting hall for use as a synagogue. Burquest is named for the Jewish communities of Burnaby, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and New Westminster, but members include those from points further.

ISRAEL

Sharon Responds

JERUSALEM — Opposition leader Ariel Sharon defended remarks he made in a New Yorker magazine interview calling Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat a murderer and a liar. Sharon said his personal views of Arafat were already known.

Boycott Call

JERUSALEM — The leader of Palestinian militias in the West Bank has called for a boycott of Israeli goods. "The Palestinians are the second largest export market for Israel after the United States," Marwan Barghouti said on Palestine Radio. Barghouti admitted, however, that the boycott would also hurt his own people because of the poorer quality of Palestinian goods.

WORLD

Kalejs Hearing

MELBOURNE — A hearing to determine whether Nazi war criminal Konrad Kalejs will be extradited to Latvia convened here last week. Latvia is seeking Kalejs' extradition to stand trial in Riga on charges of genocide and crimes against humanity. Kalejs is a former officer in the Arajs Kommando, a Latvian unit that assisted Nazi forces in murdering Jews. He was removed from Canada in 1997 after an immigration adjudicator determined he had been involved in crimes against humanity.

Bush Rapped

WASHINGTON — Some pro-choice Jewish groups denounced President George W. Bush's decision to bar federal funds to international family planning groups that offer abortion services and counselling. The National Council of Jewish Women and American Jewish Congress said the move would harm women's health programs.

Denied Pardon, Pollard Turns to Courts

WASHINGTON — With a presidential pardon denied, Jonathan Pollard's best chance for freedom after 15 years behind bars is once again through the court system, say advocates for the convicted spy.

Pollard's new attorneys are expected to push to set aside his guilty verdict and hold a new trial.

Pollard's supporters had hoped that former president Bill Clinton would include him among his final presidential pardons, and release the former U.S. Navy intelligence officer.

Many even anticipated that Clinton, who rebuffed heavy pressure from former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Pollard's behalf, would issue the pardon as a "gift" to boost beleaguered Prime Minister Ehud Barak's chances for re-election in Israel's Feb. 6 election.

It is widely believed that Clinton was swayed by the intelligence community's opposition to freeing Pollard, and the new administration of George W. Bush is expected to be even more beholden to the defence establishment.

Nevertheless, on his first workday as president, Bush was immediately beseeched by New York Congressman Anthony Weiner to "show compassion" and grant Pollard clemency.

OU Resignation

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union's executive vice-president has resigned, apparently under pressure. Rabbi Raphael Butler had come under fire for not disciplining Rabbi Baruch Lanner, a leader in the OU's youth group who has been accused of sexually harassing, molesting and physically abusing scores of teenagers. Rabbi Butler was accused of knowing of the alleged abuse by Rabbi Lanner, but not acting on it. Rabbi Butler said his resignation is an attempt to prevent divisiveness within the OU.

Rabbi Sentenced

SAN FRANCISCO — Rabbi Bentzion Pil, founder and former director of the now-defunct Jewish Education Centre, was sentenced last month to nine months in a halfway house and three years probation, and fined $10,000. In 1999, Rabbi Pil pleaded guilty to a single count of illegally structuring $1.7 million worth of bank deposits, and intentionally evading federal reporting laws on currency transactions.

Bulgaria's Role

SOFIA — A new documentary recounts how Bulgaria's Jews were rescued during the Holocaust. The rescue of 49,000 Jews by legislators and church leaders who urged Bulgaria's king to resist deportations, is the best-kept secret of World War II, said the director of Beyond Hitler's Grasp.

Art Compensation

LONDON — The British government will soon make its first payment to heirs of a Holocaust victim whose Nazi-looted art now hangs in a British museum. The government will pay $185,000 to the son of a German Jewish banker shot by the Nazis in Duesseldorf in 1937. The family was forced to sell the painting, Jan Griffier the Elder's View from Hampton Court, after the banker was murdered.

No school funding this term: Tory MPP

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Government funding of Jewish day schools won't happen anytime soon, but neither is the matter closed, Thornhill Tory MPP Tina Molinari told a group of advocates at a closed meeting last week.

Funding Jewish and other faith-based schools won't happen during Premier Mike Harris's current term in office, Molinari said, adding, however, that parents and lobby groups should set their sights on the next Conservative government.

That means Queen's Park won't move on the Jewish community's top provincial issue for at least the next 2½ years.

Tina Molinari

Harris announced last week he will run again and seek a third consecutive majority. The next election is expected in 2003.

Some of the 30 or so advocates who attended last Tuesday's round-table discussion at the Rosemount Community Centre, which was closed to media, told The CJN that Molinari said government funding is out of the question for the remainder of Harris's current term, but that concerned groups should look to the future.

Harris last week announced plans to craft his party's next platform. Dubbed Seizing Tomorrow's Opportunities, the plan involves consulting Conservatives for a successor to the Common Sense Revolution, which got the party elected in 1995, and Blueprint, the 1999 platform.

Molinari told The CJN the meeting was part of consultations the Tories are planning leading up to the next election. It was "an opportunity to make sure something is included in the [next] platform. People need to make sure they become involved in the consultation process and say, 'This is what we want to see in your promises, this is what we want to see you commit to, these are the things that are important to us.'"

Asked whether the funding of private schools could become a Tory promise in the next platform, Molinari said, "I think it can. [But] it has to be sold as a choice, that it's a parental choice, and that people have a right to choose where they want their children to go."

But she also said proponents of school funding should drop the arguments that providing tax dollars for Catholic schools but not for other faith-based schools is discriminatory.

"I don't think those work because the effect quite frankly could be that the Catholic school boards will not continue [funding.]"

Funding for private schools "has to be presented in light of the whole issue around choice and the benefits independent schools are having on students."

She said she "will be bringing the issue forward."

Georganne Burke of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF) said she was disappointed by Molinari's message, but "I appreciate her honesty.

"She was trying to be realistic and not give anyone false hopes. I was disappointed but not surprised."

The meeting was also attended by other Jewish advocates, including representatives from Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the newly formed Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS). Mainly, it was called for affected parties in Molinari's riding, including parents of children at a private Muslim school.

Thornhill is at least one-quarter Jewish and is home to several large day schools.

CJC Ontario region executive director Bernie Farber, who attended the meeting, was less inclined to give the Tories the benefit of the doubt. He said the community should adopt "more aggressive" tactics in the wake of Molinari's message.

Asked to elaborate, he said, "That's open to discussion."

While Farber feels Molinari is committed to the funding issue, he said, "For me, it was déjà vu all over again. This whole matter was answered in 1985 with the Shapiro Report [which recommended the province fund all private and independent schools.]"

Molinari said there was not enough support in the Tory caucus on the issue, Farber stated.

"When I heard there is no possible way this is going to happen this term, I was convinced they're just spinning their wheels. This was another attempt at stalling."

One community leader who attended the meeting, and asked not to be identified, took a less harsh view.

The meeting focused on "how the community should work with the government as opposed to being confrontational. [Molinari] wanted us to hear what approach will work. She was asking us to work with her.

"My sense is that she's very committed, very sincere."

Molinari also addressed "partial" funding – money earmarked for health care provision, transportation and textbooks.

Ontario's last provincial budget allocated $11 million for limited health services in private schools. "The implementation now is taking place," Molinari said. "There have been some stumbling blocks because it's never been done before."

Health assessments are being done in private schools, "and as soon as that assessment is complete, the money will flow to the schools."

While there was a sense of disappointment among the meeting's participants that the funding battle will be stretched out for several more years, there was a feeling that at least the government is listening.

"As long as we get the sense that we have someone to talk to, then we'll continue talking," the community leader said. "If we feel we're being stonewalled, then we'll revert to other tactics."

The OAJDS, which will bring together all the 40 or so Jewish day schools in the province, will meet Feb. 27 to elect its first board of directors and draw up bylaws and a mandate.

In related news, a recent year-end poll commissioned by Maclean's magazine and the Global Television Network found that 46 percent of respondents agreed with public funding for all religious schools, with 31 percent disagreeing.

As well, Wayne Levin, a founder of another grassroots group, Parents for Educational Choice, has launched a new Web site that questions current lobbying efforts by the Jewish community. The site, headed Concerned Parents of Jewish Day Schools, is at www.total.net/~levin.

'Room left to dream'

From the editor's desk

The Encyclopedia Judaica records eight different entries for individuals whose last name is Luzzatti or Luzzatto. There is also a generic entry about the family in which 10 people who bear the Luzzatti name are mentioned.

"The name is probably derived from Lausitz [in Germany] from where, according to tradition, the family emigrated into Italy in the mid-15th century, settling in the Venetian territories."

The Encyclopedia describes the Luzzatto family as "one of the most important, oldest and most respectable in Italian Jewry."

Moshe Chaim Luzzatto (1701-1746) was a scholar, thinker and poet whose writings have had a profound impact in a number of intellectual and spiritual areas including theology, ethics and kabbalah; his works are widely studied and revered.

Samuel David Luzzatto (1800-1865), philosopher, poet, commentator and translator, was also widely renowned for his vast learning, teaching skill, rational thought and elegant writing. CJN readers may recall an an insightful essay in our pages last year by Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovitz about him.

Luigi Luzzatti (1841-1927), an Italian statesman and economist, was the first Jew to become prime minister of Italy.

Jewish scholarship, literature and education owe a great deal to the creative stirrings of the various members of the Luzzatto family.

The Encyclopedia states that today, the Luzzattis "are found in most important Italian cities and scattered throughout the world."

One modern day Luzzatti, Emanuele, a near octogenarian, is one of Italy's most versatile and renowned artists.

A small sampling of only one aspect of his work can be viewed until Feb. 23 at the Istituto Italiano di Cultura in Toronto in a display called The Wonderful World of Emanuele Luzzati.

The exhibit, organized in co-operation with the Istituto Italiano di Cultura of Los Angeles and the Galleria Nuages of Milan, features 14 original collages made for the most recent Italian-language edition of Grimm's Fairy Tales.

Among the many timeless fairy tale characters visitors will recognize in the exhibit are, Cinderella, Rapunzel, Sleeping Beauty, Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs, Blue Beard, and Hansel and Gretel.

Luzzati's images are unique, full-bodied personages who fill the canvass with expressions and emotions that surely entertain children but at the same time, also, reach out to those children's parents.

The bold, playful use of colour is what one first notices in Luzatti's pictures. The detail is rich; the patterns are complicated. He uses a variety of materials – pencil, paint, pastel, fabric and paper – to provide texture, depth and an imaginative force to his work.

The witch in the Hansel and Gretel drawing is terrifying. She is twice the height of the children and more than three times their width. Her hair is askew; her three misshapen teeth protrude like fangs, and she veritably radiates frightfulness. The two children are crying, helpless and clearly at her mercy. The picture is marvellous.

Snow White lies immobile in a casket-like bed. Her face is ashen, the fading ruddiness of her cheeks a lingering proof of her still discernible beauty. The dwarfs are at her side, clearly distraught and struggling to keep their emotions in check. Yet their costume-like clothing is obviously intended by the clever artist to be a fairy tale relief to the contrasting adult world of grief and mourning.

Luzzati's skill is evident in every corner of the canvasses. The lively images draw on his massive and varied artistic talents as a painter, ceramist, cartoon animator, book illustrator and set and costume designer. There seems always to be new details popping out of the inter-related, intricate details of the figures in the drawings.

In some cases, he makes the drawings seem as if they had been drawn by a child. But the details are too rich; the placements of complementary materials too precise, and the visual insights too evocative of life's lonelier experiences for an adult not to have produced them. This is indeed part of his genius – that both child and adult will find some point of reference in them.

Of that special quality in art, Luzzati himself once stated: "In every subject there must always be a touch of ambiguity, so that it seems real, but never entirely, and there is always room left to dream." "Room left to dream" is what Emanuele Luzatti provides the viewer of the small exhibit of his works currently at the Istituto Italiano di Cultura in Toronto.

In the heart of winter, isn't that wonderful?

For more information about the exhibit, call 416-921-3802.

RAMBAM STUDY CELEBRATION: The Toronto Jewish community celebrated the completion of the 18th cycle of the study of one of Maimonides' great works, the Mishneh Torah, on Jan. 14. Under the directive of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, Jews worldwide have been systematically studying the Rambam for almost 17 years.

Brothers share their pain with the community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Avi and Eyal Avitan want the Jewish community to share their pain.

The two brothers, from Israel, were here recently on behalf of another brother, 21-year-old Adi, who along with 21-year-old Benny Avraham and 26-year-old Omar Souad, was kidnapped by Hezbollah on Oct. 7 from the Israeli side of the Israel-Lebanon border while on routine patrol.

The three soldiers were taking part in an "operational activity" on Mount Dov at the time of their disappearance. It is believed the guerillas entered Israel by crossing the Lebanese border.

A fourth Israeli, 54-year-old businessman Elchanan Tannenbaum, was abducted while he was in Europe on business.

The Avitan brothers made the trip to Toronto, they said, to raise government and public awareness of the plight of those who were kidnapped in flagrant violation of international law. The brothers also went to Montreal.

Avi and Eyal, ages 27 and 24 respectively, have received no information about the condition or whereabouts of their brother or the other hostages, and Hezbollah has denied permission to the International Committee of the Red Cross to visit them.

Prior to a recent community rally held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue that called on world leaders to work harder for the Israelis' freedom, Avi and Eyal said that after 104 days, their family – their parents and a fourth brother – still don't know if the hostages "are crying, or praying for a miracle. Where are the humanitarian agencies when we need them?" they asked.

Eyal said that since the kidnapping, "All life has stopped. We only do one thing – we try to get world attention to bring them home. We try to keep the situation in the light. We know from other kidnappings that this pressure can help."

Their parents have gone to France to meet with Foreign Minister Hubert Bedrine, and were also to have gone to Geneva to see representatives of the Red Cross and United Nations, Eyal said.

While here, the brothers met with Defence Minister Art Eggleton, who said that he and Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley would ask Lebanon for information.

In Israel, Eyal said, articles appear in the newspapers every day, rallies are organized – some have attracted up to 1,000 people – and many Israelis have put stickers on their cars that read, Your Mother is Waiting at Home.

"Our bodies are here, but our hearts are with them. Are they hungry? Are they thirsty? Are they in pain? Do they know that we are doing all we can to bring them home safely?" Eyal asked.

Avi and Eyal Avitan

Eyal wants people to continue talking about Adi. "We want [people] in every corner of the world to feel what we're feeling. We are asking everyone to cry out for us."

Speaking at the rally, Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah, told the capacity crowd that even at this distance, they are holding the hostages' hands. "We cannot forget their plight and we must do everything possible to insist that Canada intervene on their behalf."

Glen Nelson, a Lutheran minister and a participant in the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, and speaking as one who is neither Jewish nor Muslim, said, "I am in no position to judge, but we do live in the same world, and we speak to both people.

"In the pursuit of national politics, the imperative must be mutual recognition of the rule of law. Acts such as kidnappings, are not acts against an enemy; they are acts against all of us trying to live together in a crowded world.

"As a feeling citizen and a father, I stand here to join your prayers for the release of these young men."

We are not diplomats, nor are we versed in the language of international law, said Rabbi Moshe Shulman of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. "We are ordinary Jews praying for the missing soldiers simply because we care."

For 2,000 years, said Rabbi Michael Stroh of Temple Har Zion, Jews have depended on the kindness of strangers. "Sometimes there has been kindness, and sometimes there has not.

"The purpose of the Zionist movement was to find a place for Jews to live where we did not have to depend on this kindness."

We understand that ultimately, we are dependent on our endurance, our survival, and the ability to defend ourselves in our land, he said. "It is understood that it is our obligation to use our power in accordance with Jewish ethical values."

Richard Luft, 18, a representative of the Zionist youth movement, presented letters of support, written by Toronto students, to the brothers.

"Israel relies on the outside world to apply pressure. This rally is the greatest act we can take. We are sending a strong message that we want action.

"The most important role we have as Jews is to support one another," Luft said. "Young adults are protecting our homeland, and we look to them as role models. They are incredible people, to which we aspire."

At the Montreal press conference, Eyal made a personal appeal via Radio Canada International's Arabic service to the Hezbollah. In halting English, he said he knew they are human, too, and asked simply for basic information on Adi's condition.

Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital did not say whether his country is ready to trade Hezbollah members imprisoned in Israel for the three soldiers.

Avital said there are "rumours" about the fate of the soldiers, mostly originating in the Arab media, but nothing that has been independently corroborated. The latest was that they were wounded, one of them seriously enough to have had to undergo surgery, he said. Avital said the Hezbollah is violating international law, including the Geneva Convention, by holding Israeli citizens hostage inside Lebanon. He said Israel is holding Lebanon responsible for the lives of the soldiers.

Yitz Feldman dies in Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyer Irving (Yitz) Feldman, a dedicated and well-respected community leader, died recently in Israel. He was 68.

A committed religious Zionist, he and his wife of over 45 years, Bella, made aliyah last year.

Born in Toronto, Feldman attended Harbord Collegiate, the University of Toronto and Osgoode Hall law school.

He considered communal work his hobby, Bella Feldman told The CJN.

Obituary

He was active at Eitz Chaim Schools, serving as co-president from 1979 until 1993, and then as chairman of the board until shortly before he left for Israel.

Ira Berman, now executive director of Eitz Chaim, said Feldman was "really hands-on. He was on the phone on a daily basis, either with me or with [former executive director] Joe Goldwasser."

Feldman, he said, was a man of strong convictions, who stuck to those principles. "He wasn't wishy-washy."

Feldman was also a strong supporter of Ner Israel Yeshiva and of Yeshivat Or Chaim/Ulpanat Orot Girls School, which he helped found.

His involvement in education culminated with his serving as chair of the Board of Jewish Education.

Alan Reitzes, now executive director of UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, worked with him in his previous position as director of community planning and allocations. "He was a man of strong convictions. He was passionate about the community, Jewish unity, education and Israel."

During Feldman's tenure, Reitzes said, an aliyah committee was formed, and he helped develop a program in which United Israel Appeal and the federation worked with new olim in Israel.

Yitz Feldman

Rabbi Irwin Witty, former executive director of the Board of Jewish Education and a personal friend, said Feldman was "a remarkable person in many ways. He exhibited tremendous leadership qualities, as well as a sense of decency and balance. He was articulate and insightful."

While Feldman was committed to Orthodox Judaism, Rabbi Witty said, he had the interests of the whole community at heart.

Feldman was on the board of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, and when the family moved farther north, he became active in Clanton Park Congregation, eventually serving as president.

He believed in a strong central kashrut agency, and served as chair of the Kashruth Council of Toronto (COR) from 1977 to 1999, when he retired. After that, he was named honorary chair.

Religious Zionism was one of the linchpins of his life, and he was involved with Mizrachi locally, nationally and internationally. He was a member of the national Mizrachi Hapoel Hamizrachi executive and became a national vice-president.

As a youngster, Feldman contracted polio, and for the rest of his life walked with a crutch and was frequently in pain. This did not appreciably slow him down, however. Rabbi Witty remembers that "despite his physical difficulties, even in inclement weather, when others looked for excuses not to come to meetings or whatever, he was always there."

Kurt Rothschild, president of World Mizrachi, worked closely with Feldman. "We were soulmates," he mused. "We shared the same ideals, worked for the same causes."

He called him "courageous. He carried on in spite of the pain he was in." Rothschild praised him as a man of "great integrity."

The fact that he was "elevated to the highest office in the community speaks volumes about him," Rothschild said. Feldman was president of Toronto Jewish Congress, as it was then called, from 1983 to 1985.

He was active in Canadian Jewish Congress, serving on the national executive and as an officer of CJC's Ontario region.

He received the Amudim Award from the National Society of Hebrew Day Schools, an award of merit from the Beth Hatalmud Institute in New York, and the Torah Heritage Award from Eitz Chaim Schools.

In 1979, he was appointed Queen's Counsel.

The Feldmans' oldest son, Yaakov, noted that his father "raised us all in the ideal of living in Israel, not just by paying lip service, but encouraging us to live here, and actually moving here himself."

His father, he said, was a "combination of a Torah observant Jew who gave above and beyond for the betterment of the entire community."

Daughter Miriam said that "along with five million other lessons," he especially taught the importance of tzedakah and tzniut, modesty. "We try to follow in his ways."

Meyer Feldman, one of Yitz's brothers, told The CJN that "his life was a challenge for others to emulate."

Asked about what she felt Yitz Feldman was especially proud of, Bella Feldman said that "he was happy to be alive and to do things. He accomplished what he set out to do."

A memorial gathering for Feldman is being planned by the Board of Jewish Education, UJA FEDERATION, Mizrachi, Eitz Chaim, COR and Clanton Park Synagogue.

Feldman is survived by his wife Bella; children Yaakov, Miriam and Yisroel, 16 grandchildren, all of whom live in Israel; and brothers Meyer and Larry.

The Israel you don't see on the nightly news.

Photographed in Tel Aviv, on January 22, 2001

The cafés of Tel Aviv are alive with good talk and laughter.

The sidewalks are bustling with shoppers as usual.

The Israel Museum in Jerusalem is filled with giggling school children trying to behave.

Visitors atop Masada are marveling at the panorama of the Dead Sea.

Life goes on. And thousands of tourists are arriving every day.

But you don't see that on the evening news.

Talk to our people and you will sense, as always, our passionate commitment to peace.

We hope you will plan to come to Israel soon. To be with us — and to see for yourself the beautiful, vibrant Israel that you don't see on the nightly news.

Western governments also have a duty

Israel has not known one single day of true peace since it was born some 52 years ago. Thankfully, it has not had to fight an "all-out" war since 1973; unfortunately, however, it has had to cope constantly since then, and on a number of fronts, with varying degrees of "low-grade" wars, if that phrase is not itself oxymoronic.

It is very difficult for us in the West to relate to, let alone understand, the impact upon a people of having to live, each day, under so awful and burdensome a weight. How would we in Canada fare?

It is also very difficult for us in the West to relate to, let alone understand, the nature of the hatred and the dangers that are constantly directed at Israel from every direction. For Canadians, neither our language, our culture, our values, nor, in a sense, even our borders, are barriers to friendly, mutually beneficial relations with our neighbours. Yet Israel has never in 52 years heard friendly words from any of the "ordinary folk," the grassroots of the population of its five adjacent neighbours – or even from the people of Egypt and Jordan with whom it has signed peace treaties.

To the contrary. The recurring 52-year message has been hostile, to say the least.

Last weekend, the leader of the Hezbollah in Lebanon, Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, warned that his soldiers would kidnap more Israelis if Israel does not accede to his demands for a prisoner swap. "I tell Barak that if you refuse our just and fair conditions… we will have to work anew to take more of your soldiers and officers hostage," Nasrallah threatened. How would we in Canada respond to a comparable threat?

Nasrallah has engineered, since October, the kidnapping of three Israelis from Israeli soil and one Israeli who was lured to Lebanon. These missing men are: Adi Avitan, Benny Avraham, Omar Souad and Elchanan Tannenbaum. They join four other Israelis missing since 1982 and 1986: Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman Yehuda Katz and Ron Arad. Israel and the West know nothing of the condition of these men.

We are aware that western governments, including Canada's, have made inquiries in the past about the well-being of these Israeli captives. It is now time to reinvigorate those past efforts. We therefore call on western governments, especially our own, to speak to and bring pressure to bear on Lebanon, Syria and Iran to help bring these captives to their home.

Western governments too, not only Israeli, have a duty of care to the rule of law.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

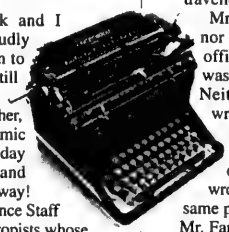
Birthright Israel works

If anyone ever asks if Birthright Israel works, tell them to give me a call. I came back Jan. 10 with the latest contingent of Canadian students. I had the privilege to be asked by our community to lead the Maritime/Ottawa/Hamilton group. I witnessed and participated in an unbelievable experience with these students, some of whom may well be among our leaders of the future.



My co-madrich, Rena Rodak and I listened, hugged and watched proudly as many of our participants began to identify themselves as Jews. I am still on a spiritual high from this trip.

We were blessed with great weather, wonderful participants and a dynamic guide to whom one could listen all day long. The food, accommodation and transportation was first class all the way! Kudos to the Canada Israel Experience Staff for their efforts, and to the philanthropists whose generosity and vision helped make the trip happen.

Under the auspices of Ottawa's Vaad Ha'ir, a committee has been formed to educate the community on the program and to offer qualified Jewish participants aged 18 to 26 a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

The Birthright Israel program works. I saw it happen. Please spread the message. The word has to get out!

JVS settlement has fundamental flaw

The Toronto Board of Rabbis acknowledges with pleasure the end of the labour dispute at Jewish Vocational Service of Greater Toronto (JVS).

We believe, as a matter of fundamental principle, a Jewish communal agency should neither conduct business nor offer non-emergency programs and services on Shabbat and Yom Tov. Nor should it require Jewish employees to work on these days.

Therefore, we express our profound disappointment that, as a result of the current negotiation, JVS will now require compensatory time from its Jewish employees who choose to observe more than seven days of Jewish holy days and festivals, and that JVS will continue to offer non-emergency programmes and services on Shabbat and Yom Tov.

Syrtash answers Farber

In response to the letter by Bernie Farber (CJN, Jan. 18) about my Jan. 11 article on the federal election, may I say that if Mr. Farber was incorrectly quoted or "paraphrased," he should take issue with the Globe and Mail, not with me.

In the middle of an election campaign, readers could infer that the comments by the Ontario Executive Director of the Canadian Jewish Congress meant that Mr. Day was "soft" on Holocaust deniers.

For Mr. Farber then to accuse me of "hyperbole" and suspicious motivations is unfair and similar to the use of manipulative character assassination so well mastered during the election by the Liberals and fellow travellers.

Mr. Farber also objected that neither The CJN nor I "let it be known" that I was a campaign official for an Alliance candidate, as if there was something sinister about this "omission." Neither Senator Grafstein nor I was asked to write an article on behalf of any organization or political party. I voiced my personal views which, incidentally, included criticism of the Alliance. Senator Jerry Grafstein wrote an excellent accompanying article on the same page.

Mr. Farber voiced no objection to The CJN about Grafstein's failure to identify himself as a Liberal member of the Senate.

Why wasn't Pollard pardoned?

I was very upset that former U.S. President Bill Clinton did not pardon Jonathon Pollard. I was even more disturbed that the world Jewish community hardly said anything about the matter.

I really cannot understand this. Although we know Pollard broke the law in his country, life imprisonment for his offence is tragic. There have been cases of convicted terrorists and spies whose actions seriously threatened world peace getting off with five or 10-year sentences.

Will someone out there explain to me what is going on?

Why praise Bouchard?

I am at a loss to understand why Jewish leaders are doing cartwheels in praise of retired Premier Lucien Bouchard. The fact that he condemned the racist remarks of one of his party members hardly makes him a hero in my eyes. Here is a man who, for his own advancement and ego, switched from party to party and accepted high profile positions and postings. For his own self-aggrandizement, he sought to destroy the best country in the world. All Canadians, including Jews, should celebrate his departure.

What are Iraq's intentions?

An Iraqi-Syrian signal to Israel

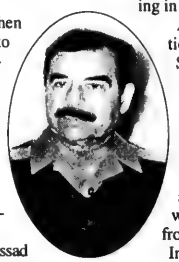
By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The most important development in inter-Arab military affairs of direct relevance to Israel emerged only recently.

The manoeuvre, Iraq's concentration of troops on its border with Syria, was agreed upon and co-ordinated between Iraq's Saddam Hussein and Syria's Bashar Assad. The Americans who discovered it warned Damascus that it was playing with fire and that the entire region could take a dangerous turn for the worse.

The Iraqis have concentrated troops on the Syrian border twice in the past few weeks. The first time, the Iraqi force consisted of four to five divisions. A short while later, the troops were withdrawn deep into Iraqi territory, and Baghdad explained it all as an exercise. It is not known if the movement included any surface-to-surface missiles – military intelligence suggests Iraq still has several dozen.

However, the concentration of Iraqi troops in this way should be seen as a strategic signal, preparing the ground for possible Iraqi military involvement. If the Iraqis resume this policy of concentrating forces on their border with Syria, or Jordan, that would further indicate their intentions.



Egypt used the same tactic when it tried to "accustom" Israel to seeing its troops move in the direction of the Suez Canal on the eve of the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Ariel Sharon did the same when he was defence minister – he transferred troops from the Negev to the border with Lebanon, and then returned them, on the eve of the 1982 Lebanon invasion.

Saddam Hussein and Bashar Assad have different reasons for agreeing to move Iraqi forces to their frontier. For Saddam Hussein, the current intifadah offers a wonderful opportunity to re-emerge as the champion of the Palestinians against Israel. He is the only Arab leader prepared to flex some muscle while making menacing gestures toward Israel. Other Arab leaders stress the need to avoid developments that plunge the Middle East into war. Saddam repeatedly threatens Israel's very survival. To avoid having his Arab neighbours misinterpret his intentions, he announced the movement of Iraqi troops well in advance, and the co-ordination of the redeployment with Damascus.

The Palestinians would, of course, welcome Iraq's intervention. Many of them believe Saddam is justified in claiming he defeated the United States and its coalition in the Gulf War. (Naturally, the "heroic warriors" make no mention of Iraq's heavy casualties or the extensive damage it sustained.)

To this day, Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat has never apologized for supporting the Iraqi invasion and occupation of Kuwait. More than any other leader, Saddam is lionized by Palestinians, and posters bearing his photograph appear at every one of their demonstrations.

A concentration of Iraqi troops near the Syrian or Jordanian border would be a balm for Palestinians. When they threaten a regional "earthquake," they actually are alluding to an intervention by Saddam Hussein in co-ordination with Hezbollah setting Israel's northern border on fire.

Assad's consent to a concentration of Iraqi forces adjacent to his country's border has served other purposes. The manoeuvre was Assad's way of presenting a threat of his own to counter the Israeli threat to Syria. Recently, some key figures in Israel have begun to declare openly that if Hezbollah heats up the Lebanon-Israel border again, or if northern Israeli communities come under fire, Israel will, as Prime Minister Ehud Barak has warned, come up with a very tough response.

According to one school of thought, that response should take the form of Israeli strikes against Lebanon and its infrastructure. Others, however, think a major Israeli response should be directed first against Syria – or against Lebanon and Syria simultaneously.

Talk of such tough action comes not only from the top brass of the IDF, but from some political leaders.

Granted, neither the government nor the IDF is interested in a military confrontation. Nonetheless, it cannot be denied that if such a showdown did materialize, Israel is not thinking in terms of massive responses.

Assad's consent to the concentration of Iraqi troops on the Iraqi-Syrian border could be interpreted as a Syrian signal to Israel. In effect, Assad is saying: "If you are contemplating launching any strikes against Syria, you should realize you will be getting more than you bargained for. If you strike Syria, the war that develops will go beyond a military confrontation between Syria and Israel."

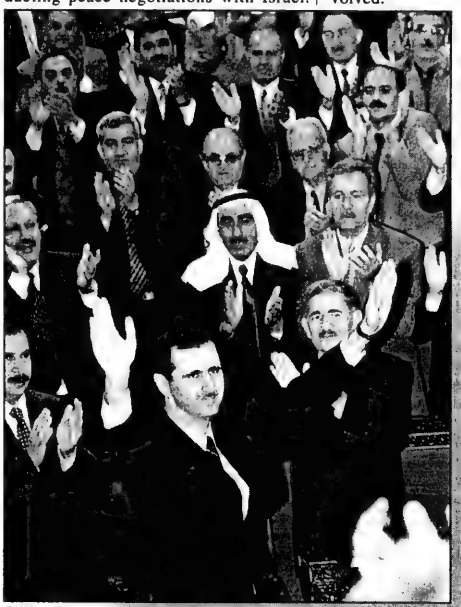
In the event of such a clash, Iraqi military involvement on Syria's behalf would be extensive, even if relations between Damascus and Baghdad are presently far from idyllic.

During the Yom Kippur War, Iraq sent two divisions to the Golan Heights, and the possibility of active Iraqi involvement should be taken into account in any Israeli projections of a flareup in the Middle East. A massive clash along Israel's northern frontier could go far beyond the limits of an armed confrontation between Israel and Hezbollah, or between Israel and Lebanon, or even between Israel and Syria.

Baghdad wolf woos Arab fold

By ZVI BAR'EL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Iraq has good relations with three regional states that have full diplomatic relations with Israel – Turkey, Jordan and Egypt. It champions the Palestinians, who have been conducting peace negotiations with Israel.



Syrian President Bashar al-Assad cheers the deputies on his arrival in parliament last year, taking the office his late father had held for the previous three decades.

[RNS/Reuters photo]

There are growing international moves to end sanctions against it. All of this raises the question: How serious are Saddam Hussein's threats against Israel, and how much help would Iraq be likely to give Syria in any military confrontation with Israel?

"Even aside from questions of ability, Syria is not in a position now where it would want to start a war," said an American diplomat familiar with the situation in Syria. "Syria has refrained from giving Israel any excuse to attack, and we are convinced its recent military manoeuvres relate to a defensive plan should Israel attack.

"Syria is in the middle of a cautious process of internal change. This is mainly focused on its economic structure and on adopting a more open approach to opposition groups that are willing to accept government red lines. In our opinion Syria also does not want to turn Lebanon into an Israeli battlefield again – or, more accurately, we are seeing signs Syria wants to renew diplomatic negotiations.

On the possibility of an independent military initiative from Iraq, the diplomat said: "We've become used to the fact you can expect anything from Iraq ... But you must remember, even when he invaded Kuwait, Saddam thought he was operating within an Arab consensus – or at least that he could mobilize such a consensus. Furthermore, he could have interpreted America's lack of determined action as confirmation, or at least tacit consent, that if Iraq invaded Kuwait, the Americans wouldn't get involved.

"Iraq cannot deceive itself today on the Arab consensus against war with Israel, or the determined stand of its friends in Europe that support the peace process. This consensus was evident at the Arab summit, when only Yemen backed Iraq's call for a jihad against Israel.

"Furthermore, Iraq is now making every effort to return to the Arab fold. It renewed diplomatic relations with Egypt last month, and its vice president visited Egypt last week for the first time in 10 years. It has excellent relations with Jordan, to which it sells subsidized oil, and for which it is the principal export market.

"Last week, Turkey appointed an ambassador to Iraq, and the two governments have announced plans to connect their countries with a rail link and resume the flow of oil. Meetings with Iranian officials are frequent. Even Kuwait has called for helping the Iraqi people.

"The Syrian commercial office that opened in Baghdad this week is one more sign of normalizing ties with Damascus. Iraq saying Syria will be an outlet for its oil also signifies a change in their formerly hostile relations. Syria has said it will not violate sanctions against Iraq, but the UN sanctions committee is unlikely to refuse Damascus permission to serve as a conduit for Iraqi oil. In any case, the entire sanctions policy is likely to be re-evaluated soon."

Good news

At a time when good news is rare, the surprising source for it is, of all places on earth, the Russian realm.

In a recent address, Rabbi Richard Hirsch, who for many years directed the World Union for Progressive Judaism, had the following to say:

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

"The story of the Jews of the former Soviet Union (FSU) is one of the greatest stories on earth. It is a story of recreation and rebirth of biblical proportions. The twin blows of the Holocaust and communism should have destroyed eastern European Jewry. They would have obliterated a weaker people. No community could have endured what the Jews did, and not only survive, but prosper.

"What a people! Our will is indomitable. The existence of the Jewish people testifies to the existence of God.

"Lenin warned that Jewish national culture is the slogan of the rabbis and our enemies. Stalin predicted that the Jewish nation is coming to an end. Even many Jews were convinced. After the Bolshevik revolution some admitted: Marx triumphed over Moses.

"There is a great awakening in the lands of the communists. Jews are coming out of the woodwork. In Russia, the Baltic states, Hungary, the Czech Republic and what is now called Middle Europe, while the signs of horror and destruction are still so clearly visible — we are also witnessing Jewish revival. That, in and of itself, is a miracle, even as we mourn the death of what could have been. Jews are discovering their Jewish roots and returning to Judaism.

"We are witnessing history. We have an urgent task now to revive Jewish life where destruction and decay reigned before. There is no greater obligation than to save Jewish lives and sustain Jewish life.

"Saving Jews is not only a question of physical survival. It is not even primarily a question of physical survival. For sure, the need to feed, heal, clothe and shelter our people is paramount. There is desperation and destitution in the FSU that require massive engagement by us, the most prosperous world Jewish community that ever existed. In the absence of the basic necessities of life, there is no life.

"Our history has taught us conclusively that the primary Jewish institution ensuring Jewish survival is the synagogue. That is not to say that all of the other institutions of Jewish life play a minor role — not at all. Some are making a huge and critical impact. But the indispensable institution, the portable vehicle that we have carried with us wherever we have journeyed since the destruction of the Jewish commonwealth, that symbolized and preserved the Jewish faith and the Jewish people, has been the synagogue."

To which I say, "Amen." When the religious movement to which you belong asks for your help in this sacred task, resolve to do your share.

Homestyle oneg Shabbat

A new and very special tradition started this year at the Atlantic Provinces Jewish Student's Federation (APJSF).

With many thanks to the generosity of members in the community and the Atlantic Jewish Council, the APJSF is now able to hold two complimentary Shabbat dinners a month in Halifax. This is a very exciting program for students here; the encouraging attendance recently is evidence of its need and popularity. From the start, it has brought many new faces to the APJSF and brought about friendships from within.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

The program was created after numerous discussions and debates this year about how to raise student involvement in the community and student-related events. The APJSF executive decided that the idea of a bi-monthly Shabbat dinner was the most ideal, especially if the cost could be minimized. For many students living on their own, Shabbat can be more difficult to observe, and even the smallest Friday night dinner and oneg Shabbat may simply not be an option. A Shabbat dinner would not only be enjoyable but also a necessity for the growing student population in Halifax looking for Jewish content in their lives.

After the funding for the program came through, two inspiring people came forward to offer everything else: Isabela and Tibor Kovari, new members of the Halifax community. Tibor is cantor at the Beth Israel Synagogue and Isabela works with younger children and teaches Israeli dance. The energetic and youthful couple have opened up their home (and kitchen) every other Friday night to starving students. The first Shabbatot started out with only a few in attendance, and the more recent have had as many as thirty.

My first evening there a few weeks ago was a real eye-opener. The dinner filled a void for the students that they did not even realize they had. From the moment I walked in to the moment I left, I felt the wonderful sense of home. The food was delicious, and though food, in our culture, has always been important, there are other components that are crucial as well. Isabela and Tibor took care of them, welcoming every person who walked in and having no qualms about finding places for the large group in the quickly filling room. Soon their cozy dining room was packed with long tables, chairs and happy, well-nourished students.

Although Isabela and Tibor prefer that people call ahead to reserve a seat, they did not fret about people who showed up without RSVPing. I should not say that this should ever be a habit for any well-mannered individual, but it was very impressive how prepared our hosts were for this possibility (my Mother's read on this: Kids, please don't try this at home!). In fact, Isabel and Tibor's hospitality was appreciated by all and in many ways is the drawing card to their dinners.

Guest speaker for the evening, Rabbi Benji Jacobi, enlightened us on Jewish mysticism and folklore within our modern-day society. Rabbi Jacobi is an engaging individual, and we were all pleased to meet him.

What I enjoyed most about the dinner was the informal environment in which it took place. Perhaps this is why so many students are gravitating towards it. Isabela and Tibor have made the students feel very comfortable, and they have gone that extra mile in improving the quality and quantity of former Shabbat dinner programs. They have formed a mishpachah for Friday nights that is growing every couple of weeks. And, as said before, students also enjoy seeing their friends and making new ones.

No one can agree about what the best part of the night is: the food, the conversation, the hospitality or the hosts. All that is agreed upon is that we are thrilled to have this new addition to our lives at school and we hope that it will only grow with time.

For those interested in joining us in further weeks for dinner and are not on our mailing list already, please email APJSF@hotmail.com. As a student, Shabbat might be difficult to observe every week, but in Halifax, every 2 weeks, the family awaits.

The value of camp

Summer is a little over five months away but this is the time when camps begin gearing up for the eight weeks of meals, programs and, most importantly, campers.

Winnipeg boasts two very successful Jewish summer camps, both of which have a lot to offer. The B'nai Brith Camp specializes in camping and outdoors, while my camp, Camp Massad, a Hebrew speaking camp, is most associated with creativity, drama and art. Every year, both reach their capacity, which says a lot about the value of attending an overnight camp.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

I think that having such an experience is one of the most important in a child's life. The reason I wish to comment about summer camps is to show parents what camps can do for their children.

Before I go any further, however, I need to point out that I am biased because I have been to Camp Massad for virtually all my life. The basis of the article comes from my experience from Massad, but I think that what I am about to say can relate to other camps as well.

I honestly believe (and this might be a tad unsettling for some) that, at camp, most children transform themselves into people that their parents rarely get to see.

For example, at Camp Massad we write and produce plays that can be anywhere from two minutes to half an hour. I have seen kids who in the city are quiet and withdrawn, stand up in front of 200 people and recite lines and act as if they were stars on Broadway. When the kids say their last line and the crowd cheers, these children get a boost of confidence that can turn them into outgoing and self-assured individuals.

One of the most valuable parts of a camp experience are the friends you can make. Personally, I have made lifelong friends at camp, and I have seen other campers do the same. I could name many kids, who in the city are either considered loners or do not have many friends, come to camp for a few weeks and make tight bonds with people that can last well into the year. It is quite an amazing thing to watch and experience.

Other than the confidence, friendships and self-esteem that children experience at camp, other life lessons such as developing leadership skills and understanding group dynamics are fostered as well.

I have saved one of the most important aspects of attending a summer camp until the end. The Judaism that children learn from both these camps can create a strong Jewish bond that they may not receive from their Jewish education in the city. While Camp Massad does all of its programming and meals in Hebrew, both camps hold prayers and Shabbat programs.

Such programs with Jewish content are a priority. Many of the kids that attend camp attend Jewish school, but many do not, or they have left the Jewish education system at some point in their lives. Camp involves these kids in Jewish activities and, as a result, some Jewish affiliation is going to be instilled in these impressionable youth.

I could write a whole essay on this topic, and if I talked about the experiences that come out of a child progressing from camper to staff, I would create an entire novel.

Summer camp significantly shapes people's identities, and the turnout at Winnipeg's Jewish camps shows that many parents have recognized this fact. But for the parents who have not sent their kid to camp for whatever reason, remember that the knowledge and experiences gained from a summer camp are priceless.

Israel considers separation from Palestinians

Shortly after calling the Feb. 6 special election, Prime Minister Ehud Barak succinctly spelled out the theme of his forthcoming electoral campaign. It would, he explained, be "a referendum on the path to peace and security... and separating from the Palestinians."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The last phrase, turning on the concept of unilateral separation, is of particular importance, since Barak has been emphasizing it for at least the past six months.

He has drawn attention to it in response to a series of disconcerting events: the collapse of the Camp David summit last July, the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in late September, the virtual breakdown of the Oslo process, and the decidedly frigid reception accorded to Bill Clinton's peace proposals by the Palestinians.

Of late, Barak has returned to this leitmotif again. After a cabinet meeting, he told reporters: "Our relations with the Palestinians have never been described as a marriage of love, and that is why we must try for a separation." Several days later, he invoked the spectre of Bosnia as he warned of the need for unilateral disengagement in case an agreement eluded Israel and the Palestinians.

Israeli commentators have speculated that Barak will opt for unilateral separation should the president of the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat, declare unilateral independence, or should the security situation unravel.

Barak is not the only major Israeli politician who has dwelled on unilateral separation. Ariel Sharon, his Likud adversary, has urged Israel to prepare for it.

Unilateral separation, therefore, will be a salient issue in Israeli politics regardless of who wins the election. It will come about if Israel redraws its borders without consulting the Palestinians, dismantles isolated Jewish settlements in the heart of heavily-populated Palestinian territories (Areas A and B), reinforces checkpoints in the West Bank and Gaza, and severely restricts the flow of goods and labour to and from Israel.

Unilateral separation, though, is not a new idea. After a series of suicide bombings perpetrated by Hamas and Islamic Jihad in 1994 and 1995, the then prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, instructed the police minister, Moshe Shahal, to draw up a plan for Israeli disengagement from the Palestinians. Rabin's intention was to "take Gaza out of Tel Aviv." In 1996, the police minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's cabinet, Avigdor Kahalani, also pushed for unilateral separation.

The scheme was opposed by right-wing politicians, loath to abandon Jewish settlements beyond the Green Line and fearful that unilateral separation would be an implicit approval of Palestinian statehood. The left supported it on the grounds that it could pave the way for the end of Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza.

Unilateral separation did not appeal to the Israeli business sector, either. It expressed concern that Israel's lucrative trade with the Palestinians, worth about $2 billion annually, would be curtailed or cut off.

As for the Palestinians, they charged that unilateral separation would be tantamount to a colonial land grab, apartheid and a declaration of economic warfare.

The plan, in reality, was never more than a vision, and was shelved due to its prohibitive costs. Barak revived it because he dreaded Arafat's oft-repeated threat to proclaim unilateral Palestinian independence, and because he feared Israel and the Palestinians would fall short of signing a peace agreement.

Such an accord, as matters stand today, appears increasingly remote. The Palestinians were not terribly impressed by Barak's concessions at the Camp David summit. In particular, they rejected his definition of territorial contiguity. Reports suggest that Barak envisioned a future Palestinian state divided into three disconnected cantons. More important, the Palestinians insist on the "right of return" of Arab refugees to Israel. For its part, Israel rebuffed Clinton's proposal for joint sovereignty of the Temple Mount.

Given the seemingly unbridgeable gaps in their respective positions, neither Israel nor the Palestinian Authority is politically or psychologically ready for the extremely painful compromises that a final agreement would entail. Consequently, the allure of unilateral separation is all the more appealing today.

Elements of unilateral separation already have been put into place by Barak since the eruption of the current intifadah. The West Bank and Gaza have been subjected to costly internal and external closures, and Gaza's airport has been regularly closed.

In another sign that unilateral separation is on the front burner, Israel has announced plans to build a security fence along the length of the Green Line.

At this juncture, unilateral separation is nothing but a declaration of intentions, and it is by no means clear whether the Israeli government can or will implement it.

For better or worse, Israel's sophisticated economy is inextricably entwined with the Palestinians' Third World economy. The Palestinian market is an important one for Israeli industry, and about 85 percent of the Palestinians' exports are sold to Israel. Upwards of 100,000 Palestinian workers are wholly dependent on Israeli jobs, and in addition, Israel supplies the Palestinian Authority with electricity, water and gas.

A unilateral declaration of separation would cripple the Palestinians' fragile economy and thus heighten their impoverishment, desperation and rage. Given their close geographic proximity, Israelis and Palestinians are destined or doomed to live together.

Another point worth considering is that unilateral separation can only truly work if isolated Jewish settlements are dismantled. If they are not uprooted, these flashpoints will be a constant source of tension, and the Palestinian Authority – which fully controls only 18 percent of the West Bank at present – will be left with a unwieldy patchwork of disconnected land lacking any semblance of viability. This would be a formula for incessant strife and bloodshed.

Realizing that this potential problem poses an immense obstacle to the achievement of unilateral separation, Israel intimated recently that it will withdraw unilaterally from parts of the West Bank should peacemaking with the Palestinians grind to a halt. How this putative objective can be reconciled with Barak's – and Sharon's – promise of not evacuating settlements unilaterally remains to be seen.

A recent poll published by the Israeli daily Ma'ariv suggests that 70 percent of Israelis favour unilateral separation. Yet critics wonder whether it is really a plausible method of dealing with the Palestinians.

Ami Ayalon, the former director of Israel's internal intelligence service – the Shin Bet – has said that unilateral separation will have a "boomerang effect" on Israel. Meron Benvenisti, the former deputy mayor of Jerusalem, has described it as a pipedream and "a euphemism for collective punishment." Martin Indyk, the U.S. ambassador to Israel, has called it "a disastrous illusion." Dennis Ross, the former U.S. Mideast envoy, said last week that it will not endure as a long-term solution.

Be that as it may, Barak and Sharon seem intent on testing the waters of unilateral separation.

Bill Clinton's legacy

Bill Clinton – the 42nd president of the United States – left office on Jan. 20, falling short of achieving two key foreign policy objectives. As hard as he tried, he was simply unable to facilitate peace agreements between Israel and the Palestinians, on the one hand, and Israel and Syria on the other.

Bill Clinton

Yet Clinton came tantalizingly close to pulling it off. He and his dedicated emissaries worked tirelessly with four Israeli prime ministers to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict. But in the end, he failed to overcome the hostility, hatred, misunderstandings, fears and mistrust that characterize this most intractable of disputes.

With the exception of Jimmy Carter, who brokered the 1978 Camp David accords and the 1979 Israel-Egypt peace treaty, there was never a president who was as intimately involved in this heroic diplomatic quest as Clinton. He coaxed Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat to shake hands at an impressive ceremony sanctifying the 1993 Declaration of Principles. He brought Benjamin Netanyahu and Arafat together after the 1996 Jerusalem tunnel riots. He encouraged them to move forward with the Hebron (1997) and Wye (1998) agreements. Last December, he unveiled creative proposals that may yet serve as a basis for further discussions.

Clinton worked with the late Hafez al-Assad to restart bilateral negotiations on the Syrian tract, and he convened a summit when Syria belatedly decided to resume talks with Israel. He was also there when Israel and Jordan signed a historic peace treaty in 1995.

Clinton never gave up. Give him an A+ for effort.

A time to anticipate spring

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

It is February. The sky outside is gray, winds chill with cruel regularity, a foot of packed snow and ice is lying on the ground, hidden below it are several more feet of solid frost. If there is a more uninviting place, then it must be on the far side of the moon. In this frozen land no plant life could possibly exist. Or could it?

February is winter's midpoint. A time to anticipate the end of the frost. From a little trickle at first, then as the sun's rays continue to warm the ground, the earth begins to come back to life. What was once a frozen winter wasteland now begins to bloom. Soggy soil will firm and support all sorts of seeds, flowers and weeds. A miracle of renewal will unfold again with the change in the seasons of the world.

Winter's midpoint is at once the cold rock bottom and the time to anticipate the coming warmth. It is precisely now that we observe Tu b'Shvat, literally, the 15th of the Hebrew month of Shvat, a day corresponding to winter's midpoint. As a date, it was first recorded in the Mishnah 2,000 years ago. In practice today, it is observed as a day celebrating the fruits of the trees.

Families and communities will gather for Tu b'Shvat festivities. There will be a meal comprised almost entirely of fruits. A cornucopia of dozens of fruit species, domestic, imported and outright exotic, will serve as the centrepiece. Surrounding them will be trays of candied citrus fruits, and of spiced and candied vegetables such as carrots, baby eggplant and yams. Others will be full of all sorts of nuts and dried fruits.

The platters are set on a bed of green leaves adorned with fresh flowers and garden vegetables. Candles are lit to add light and shade to this multi-coloured spread.

Two bottles of wine are also placed on the table – the first contains the lightest and clearest of white wines, the second is a bottle of dark wine, more black than red.

The seder now begins. Did I mention seder? Yes indeed! The Sephardim have a seder on Tu b'Shvat, just as one has a seder on Pesach. This seder is called Pri Eitz Hadar — The Fruits of Beauty. It is mystical, a ritual to recognize God's gift of fruits, one that attributes biblical verses to each species. During this seder (which means order), prayers and blessings are said, as each of the fruits is tasted.

Then come the "four cups." Yes, just like Pesach – but not quite! The first cup raised is of the clear wine; the second cup is also clear wine, but with a little dark wine diluting it. The third cup has even more dark wine in it, making it darker still, and the fourth and last cup is all dark. This is symbolic of the powers of nature, white being the weakening of nature during the winter season, a weakness that is gradually invigorated as the weather warms. Red wine represents this vitality.

For Sephardim, Tu b'Shvat is an important celebration in the cycle of the year, for it calls on us to gather fruits when they are the farthest from their season. It forces us to take notice of our bounty and be grateful for it, when it could so easily be overlooked. Tu b'Shvat speaks of forward focus and of optimism. It says that just when we are at our coldest, it will indeed begin to warm. As day follows night, summer will again come, and that thought alone is warming.

Of Berliners, Oppenheimers and Rothschilds

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Roots & Remembrance

From about 1840 to roughly 1900, one sort of Jewish immigrant was so familiar in North American cities that he was caricatured in novels, newspapers articles and comic strips.

According to the stereotype, he was a prosperous merchant, garbed in bowler hat, business suit and thick moustache. He manufactured or traded in pianos, fine watches, clothing, cigars, dry goods or other commodities. His name was Oppenheimer, Rosenheim, Stern, Frankfurter or Goldschmidt; he was invariably Reform and highly assimilated; and he was of German origin, one of an elite cadre of gentrified German Jews to reach America before the massive influx of impoverished Russian Jews began in 1880.

Dubbed "Our Crowd" by American historian Stephen Birmingham, these early German Jewish immigrants were brilliant achievers. In the United States, they included the Loebs, Kuhns, Gimbels and Guggenheims. In the musical sphere they were represented by the likes of Berlin, Rogers, Hammerstein, Hart, Kern and the Gershwins. In Canada, their number included the Hart, Myers, Nordheimer, Rossin and Hirschfelder families.

The -heim and -heimer group of names (Bodenheimer, Fechheimer, Hoffheimer, Kuppenheim, Lowenheim, Pappenheimer, Wertheimer) were especially plentiful. So were names ending in -burg and -burger, -feld and -felder, -stein and -steiner, -thal and -thaler. Other names commonly ended in -auer, -bach, -baum, -dorf, -hof, -stadt, -wald and -wasser.

Many prominent German-Jewish families had taken on surnames long before they were required to by law. Frankfurt was apparently the only major Ashkenazic community where all Jews had adopted permanent family names long before the Napoleonic era. Old Frankfurt families like Zunz, Oppenheimer, Bing, Worms and Rothschild have been in continuous possession of their names since the 16th century.

Some names derived from house signs, family crests or animal symbols (Adler, Hecht, Rothschild, Strauss, Wolf). Some derived from cities (Berliner, Frankfurter, Hamburger, Posener), territories or states (Frank, Hess) or scenic-geographic features (Greenfeld, Rosenberg, Rosenthal). Some names reflected occupational origins (Glaser, Goldschmidt, Schuster, Wechsler) while others derived from Hebrew personal, biblical or priestly names (Moses, Salomon, Levy, Kahn).

A small number, likely assigned by government officials, fall into the category of ridiculous or derogatory names. Toronto genealogist Henry Wellisch has documented instances of Aftergeruch (backside smell), Hinterviertel (hindquarter), Jammerlapp (crybaby), Kotspritzer (mud splasher), Saumeier (pig farmer), Schwewelduft (sulphur smell), and others more offensive.

Decades ago, historian Georg Meyer-Erlach examined a list of 10,623 German-Jewish soldiers who had died in World War I, and ranked the names according to their frequency of occurrence. His findings appeared in Jüdische Familien Forschung, a journal of Jewish family research published in Germany between 1925 and 1938. The top 20 names: Levy, Mayer, Cohen, Kahn, Stern, Wolff, Strauss, Rosenthal, Goldschmidt, Heymann, Lewin, Weil, Rothschild, Hirsch, Baer, Salomon, Rosenberg, Adler, Katz, Marx.

In America, however, as onomastic scholar Rudolf Glanz has documented, many German-Jewish families Americanized their names, turning Blum into Bloom, Goldschmidt into Goldsmith, Gutherz into Goodheart, Hecht into Pike, Marmelstein into Marblestone, Rindskopf into Reno, Sussengut into Seasongood. But not always did they obscure the genealogical trail when they did so.

In an article on "German-Jewish Names in America" (1970), Glanz related the case of David Feuerstein, a Michigan immigrant who took the name Flint in 1824, but later became known as David Gun to avoid association with a notorious horse thief. Some years later, when a rich uncle died without a direct heir in the East Indies, Gun "was in great distress for he could not legitimize himself." During a protracted lawsuit in Wayne County, he paid a fortune to lawyers in order to prove his rightful claim to the estate.

Jewish Life

An immigrant's journey

My Love Affair With America – The Cautionary Tale of a Cheerful Conservative*, by Norman Podhoretz, US Free Press, $25.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Some 30 years ago, Norman Podhoretz, longtime editor of Commentary Magazine, wrote an autobiographical account of his journey from an immigrant Jewish neighbourhood in Brooklyn to the sophisticated and polished world of New York literary society. He called his book Making It. Many readers were offended by his undeviating quest for recognition and success, for his unbridled ambition, and the satisfaction – not far removed from boasting – in having achieved his goal. He wrote that the road from Brownsville to Manhattan was "one of the longest journeys in the world."

Breaking Ranks and Ex-Friends, previous books in his long-running autobiography, made clear his reasons for parting with the political left and how he appraised and eventually parted from some of his former acquaintances.

Now, in his latest work, Podhoretz, a sage of 70, discusses his Yiddish speaking grandparents and refers to them as a raucous, disruptive and emotionally tangled crew.

These combative relatives spoke little English, and at the age of five Podhoretz entered school with an unmistakable Galitzianer accent. One day a teacher asked him, "Where are you going, little boy?" He responded, "I goink op de stez." This led to a class in remedial speech, which was of immeasurable benefit and, in time, to scholarships to Columbia University and Cambridge.

Podhoretz lambasts proponents of bilingual education, especially for Spanish speaking children. His heart goes out, he says, to today's immigrants, robbed of the chance to achieve economic and social equality and to love the "sound and music of the English language."

Among the author's memorable portraits is that of his maternal grandmother, a barely literate East European immigrant who had survived privation, war and anti-Semitism. For her, America was a haven, but not really a home. Upon hearing on the radio that "Uncle Sam Needs You" just as her son is being drafted into the army during World War II, she shrieks in Yiddish: "Who is he, that Uncle Sam? Him I would especially like to send six feet under!"

In his affection for America, Podhoretz berates shortsighted writers and intellectuals who delight in derogating American culture as Philistine and vulgar and who downgrade America's system of government. For him, America is different from all other countries in which Jews have lived because it has accepted them as no other. Despite the anti-Semitism that has always existed alongside a tradition of acceptance, the fact is that Jews have become Americans in a way that they had never been Russians or Poles. An optimistic and grateful patriotism, he insists, is the best antidote for creeping moral decay.

At the book's end, Podhoretz chooses the Passover hymn Dayenu ("That alone would have been enough for us") to indicate the manifold blessings of his country. The Exodus story provides an allegory of oppression and redemption, while it illuminates his larger thesis about the Jews and America.

For many Canadian Jews, especially of the second and third generations, whose experiences are not dissimilar from those of the author, despite the many differences between the two countries, and the author's conservative views, this absorbing work will be of special interest.

Tu b'Shvat and the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Next Wednesday evening is Tu b'Shvat, the traditional Jewish birthday of the trees.

Not a major holiday on the calendar, Tu b'Shvat has always has a special significance for school kids, for the pioneers of Israel and more recently, for members of the environmental movement. And perhaps because of a lack of formal liturgy associated with the day, many people have crafted new observances to commemorate it. You can find a wide range of celebrations for Tu b'Shvat on the Internet.

The name of the holiday comes from the day on which it occurs on the Hebrew calendar – the 15th of Shvat. The Hebrew letters that spell the number 15 can be pronounced as "Tu" [http://www.jewish.com/holidays/tubishvat. shtml]. Tu b'Shvat is not mentioned in the Torah, but it is one of the first issues addressed in the Mishnah. The 15th of the month of Shvat was established as the New Year for purposes of tithing fruit. Nowadays, the holiday has evolved into a kind of Jewish arbour day.

One tradition known to every schoolchild in Israel is the planting of trees on Tu b'Shvat. You can peek in on Noam and his kindergarten class as they do just that in Modi'in [http://judaism.about.com/religion/judaism/library/holidays/tubishvat/bl_tubishvat_planting.htm].

And even if you couldn't make it to Israel for this year's holiday, you can still plant a tree – using your keyboard. The Jewish National Fund's Online Tree Planting Center lets you choose which certificate you'd like, with a personalized inscription and the number of trees at $18 each [http://www.jnftrees.com/]. At the same time, you may want to recite the Tree Planter's Prayer, which was composed by Rabbi Ben Zion Chai Uzziel and can be found at the JNF site [http://www.kkl.org.il/plant/english/tefila. htm]: "As for these saplings that we plant before You today, deepen their roots and increase their magnificence that they may blossom and be accepted among the other trees of Israel for blessing and for beauty. Strengthen the hands of all our brethren who labour in the work of the holy soil and who cause the wilderness to bloom…"

Actually, trees aren't alone in having their birthday on Tu b'Shvat. Israel's Constituent Assembly, now known as the Knesset, held its first meeting on Tu b'Shvat 5709 (Feb. 14, 1949). Every year, members of Knesset mark the day by planting trees. You can find out more at the Knesset's Tu b'Shvat site where you can plant a virtual tree in the Knesset's virtual forest [http://www. knesset.gov.il/tubishvat/ eindex.html].

The Jewish Theological Seminary has put together a marvelous Tu b'Shvat page geared toward activities kids can do both alone and with their parents [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/tubshevat/]. These include creating a Tu b'Shvat leaf mobile, discussing why trees need a birthday and planting a kitchen forest. The Torahtots Tu b'Shvat site has pages to colour, word find and other games [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/tubshvat/tubshvat.htm].

The first fruit tree to bloom in Israel is the almond or in Hebrew, the shekadiah with its white blossoms. And that also gives us the most famous song for the holiday Hashekediah Porachat – The Almond Trees are White. You can find the lyrics [http://www.vjholidays.com/tubshvat/song.htm] and listen to the delightful tune online [http://www.playj.com/sportsnetwork/static/Artist_6877.html]

And then there is the food. Tu b'Shvat is remembered around the world by eating almonds, dates, figs, raisins and (what always seemed to be rock hard) carob. If you want to put a bit more work into celebrating the food, here are some recipes to try out. The RFCJ archives has a large assortment of fruit-based recipes for the day [http:// www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=TU_b_SHEVAT]. You can start off with Sephardi "Prehito" bulgur pudding followed by dates stuffed with lamb and compote with spiced wine. Top it all off with walnut carob halvah. If you're still hungry for more, check out Rosa Rasiel's menu: chicken tangine, fruit nut log and apricot balls [http://www.ucook.com/news2.cfm?item_no=591]. Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.vjholidays.com/tubshvat/recipes.htm] has Tu b'Shvat fruity chicken, raisin relish, chicken rimonim ("the pomegranates lend a beautiful colour and delicate flavor to the chicken").

Jewish Life

Pragmatism or idealism?

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Opinion

He had a beautiful voice.

"Amazing grace, how sweet the sound, That sav'd a wretch like me! I once was lost but now am found, Was blind, but now I see..."

I had been sitting in the Beth Sholom auditorium talking to another Out of the Cold volunteer, when he came up to us and asked innocently, "Do Jewish churches have the same hymns as Christian churches?"

He was young – in his 20s – good-looking, well-dressed. If he hadn't been watching Ace Ventura: Pet Detective with the other guests, I wouldn't have suspected he was homeless. We were wearing our blue volunteer name-tags, but he wasn't wearing his red guest one.

After we answered his question (no, Jewish songs are generally not the same as Christian ones), and briefly explained the differences between a church and a synagogue, he sat down and began talking: about his old Baptist church in Cobourg, about how he and his seven-year-old cousin used to hang out before the boy died of cancer, about music.

He talked a lot about music. He used to sing in his church choir, he said, and he now played saxophone and bass and was a member of a quartet called Threesome, which, he said, sang "love songs, gospel songs, sad songs."

That's when he serenaded us with Amazing Grace. He began in a baritone and shifted to a bass midway through. I listened for a while, but when he started singing Lean on Me, I joined in. Afterwards, we sat quietly for a moment, and then I told him about a wild version of Amazing Grace by one of my favourite bands, Béla Fleck and the Flecktones.

"Oh, yeah?" he said with interest. "Bring it."

I smiled and filed the thought away, thinking that I would bring the CD when I came back to volunteer next week.

But then he gave an embarrassed laugh, as if he had given too much away and asked the impossible.

You could see it in some of the volunteers' eyes – that look: determined, preoccupied. A lot to do tonight: go to the bank, pick up Becky, make dinner, start the laundry, eat dinner, call Joe about that proposal, meet with Cynthia, volunteer for Out of the Cold, prepare lunches, go to bed.

But for the guy I met, Out of the Cold isn't something sandwiched in between other errands: It is the difference between huddling under a bridge all night and sleeping in a warm, dry, albeit hard-floored, auditorium in Beth Sholom Synagogue.

There is a fine line between "us" and "them," and often the only thing separating us is luck. Yet we generally don't like to look over that line to the other side; the more we admit how blurry the line is, the more vulnerable we admit to being. And that's often too scary to contemplate. Instead, we tell ourselves not to get too friendly. If we get involved, so the logic goes, we get entangled in their lives and can't get out without a price.

That was the reasoning behind the other volunteer's advice to me: Don't bring the CD next week. You can't. It's the impossible.

But how could I not? He had told me about himself. He had spilled confidences. Call me naive, but I believed every word he said. And I believed the pain beneath the nonchalance when he said, "I don't want to hang out with those homeless guys over there," and laughed. He had trusted me. He had sung the song to me.

How could I not?

The eternal question: Pragmatism or idealism? Which wins out?

It bothered me that I had to make a choice, but I thought about it hard. In the end, I chose pragmatism. I justified my decision by saying that all he had needed was an opening. I had provided him with a safe environment – an attentive ear, a friendly smile. In the end, I had done the best I could do. I was there.

Perhaps I'll be there next week for him again. But even if I am and he is, the CD won't be.

CELEBRATE

TU B'SHVAT 2001/5761
THE NEW YEAR OF TREES

"SAY IT WITH TREES"

- Help replace 10,000 dunams (3,000 acres) of trees recently destroyed by terrorist fires
- Send a message of love and hope to Israel
- Help make Israel green and beautiful

TU B'SHVAT has been celebrated as the New Year of Trees for many centuries. Traditionally, we celebrate by planting trees in Israel.

TU B'SHVAT has become known all over the world as THE JNF HOLIDAY. Jewish National Fund organizes many thousands of tree-plantings over the length and breadth of Israel on TU B'SHVAT.

PLANT TREES IN ISRAEL
WITH THE HELP OF JNF

CLIP AND MAIL, FAX or E-MAIL the information to us and JNF will plant your trees in Israel in celebration of TU B'SHVAT.

Plant trees for yourself, your family, your friends or your associates. It is a wonderful way to establish a link with the land and the people of Israel and to show your support. And, you will help make Israel green and beautiful.

Trees are symbols - of hope, of beauty, of strength, of strong roots, of the future, of a love and of a bond with the soil of Israel. Your trees link you with the land and people of Israel.

Celebrate TU B'SHVAT during this first year of the New Century by sending your message of love, hope and support to the people of Israel!

Mitchell Gold's peace plan

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mitchell Gold would like to bring together all the spiritual elders from all over the world to plant a tree of peace in Jerusalem.

"Jerusalem shouldn't be for this group or that group," Gold said in an interview. "Jerusalem is for all people. It's for humanity."

Mitchell Gold with Butrus Butrus Ghali

Gold, a chartered accountant by training, has participated in seven tree-planting ceremonies around the world.

"The planting of tree ceremony requires understanding by both sides through education. It requires burying the weapons of war so that trees will grow from the weapons," Gold said. "If spiritual elders from all religions can get together to plant trees of peace all around Jerusalem, then that city can truly become a symbol for world peace."

The spiritual elders, Gold explained, would be determined by a process and consensus that would take place at a spiritual forum, which would be in place at the United Nations.

Gold has recently returned from the International Conference on the Culture of Peace in Madrid, Spain, and and a meeting with former secretary-general of the United Nations, Butrus Butrus Ghali, that took place in Paris, France.

On both trips, Gold presented his views on global responsibilities and duties.

We have to be responsible for more than just those who live within our national borders. "Our global duty is to the six billion people living in our planet," Gold said.

On March 23, 1999, the Parliament of Canada passed a motion (M-239) stating that "in the opinion of the House, the government should enact a tax on [international] financial transactions in concert with the international community," Gold said.

In Madrid, Gold proposed a similar tax which he called the one percent solution – a global tax or tithe to fund the pursuit of peace on numerous fronts, including education.

One of Gold's priorities is the International Association of Educators for World Peace (IAEWP), which has developed an education program focusing on the common core values between people. The IAEWP has consultative status at UNICEF and UNESCO, as well as with other agencies at the United Nations, he said.

"We've taken this program to over 100 different countries today. It is also in 40 or 50 different schools in Canada.

"Peace will come through education and when peace starts to make money." he said. To this end, Gold has a business plan to make peace profitable. He proposes to create a logo – "homeplanet."

All participating corporations would be able to market the homeplanet logo in the hope that consumers would learn to recognize the brand and what it stands for. This would become profitable for companies as they increase market share.

Ultimately, Gold hopes that the money raised from use of the logo and a global tax would be managed by the international body of spiritual elders and go towards promoting a culture of world peace.

Growing up in Minnesota, we were taught that on Tu b'Shvat, Israeli children marched the country's length and breadth planting saplings.

But Tu b'Shvat is more than that. The source of this day is in the talmudic tractate Rosh Hashanah, which explains what new year for the trees actually means.

Tu b'Shvat is the day of the year when trees stop absorbing water from the ground, and instead draw nourishment from their sap.

This means that fruits that have blossomed prior to the 15th of Shvat could not be used as tithe for fruit that blossomed after that date. So it's a matter of Jewish law.

The Tu b'Shvat custom has evolved to eat the fruits for which the Torah praises the Land of Israel, as mentioned in the verse referring to the Land of Israel as a good land, "a land of wheat, barley, grape, fig, and pomegranate, a land of olives and date honey" (Deuteronomy 8:8).

The custom seems to manifest itself in a lot of eating of dried fruits. If you wish to join your Israeli compatriots this Tu b'Shvat, try the following recipes.

TU B'SHVAT FRUIT COMPOTE

This dried fruit compote contains no additional sugar, plus does not require cooking.

1 cup pitted dates
1 cup pitted prunes
1 cup dried apricots
1 cup raisins
1 cup dried apples
1½-2 cups apple juice
1 tsp. cinnamon
2 tsp. fruit-flavored liqueur
flaked coconut for garnish

JNF seeks help in replacing torched trees

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Yaen Vered, Jewish National Fund of Canada's shaliach, this year's Tu b'Shvat celebration is particularly significant.

This year the organization has to concentrate on replacing the acres of trees in the Galilee and the northern part of Israel that were torched during recent terrorist incidents.

Vered, who co-ordinates JNF's Tu b'Shvat activities, including a telethon on Feb. 11 chaired by Jo Ann Gold, said he is turning to the Jewish community for support of the organization's goal of replanting 10 trees for every one that was torched.

"Jews are not allowed to uproot or burn trees, even in the middle of war. We are not supposed to harm a tree. That is why we are in such pain.

"We want everyone to take their part in replacing the trees that were so cruelly torched," he said.

The telethon, said Gold, is a good opportunity for people to pitch in and get involved. "A small sum will purchase a seedling that will grow into a tree, and the purchaser will have put down some roots in Israel," she said.

Vered said he still feels something when he sees the trees he planted in Israel as a child. "I want people to have that same feeling."

Israel is the only country in the world, said Vered, that had more trees at the end of the 20th century than at the beginning.

"JNF has planted about 210 million trees in Israel since the Turks decided to make the land barren at the beginning of the century.

"We were lucky, however, that they did not take all the trees. We can still see some olive trees on the road from Tzvat to Haifa that have remained.

"Trees were destroyed in areas of the country that are Israeli without question. The damage was done in main-state Israel – within our established territories," he said.

Tu b'Shvat, which Vered said is symbolically a JNF holiday, is a celebration of renewal. "We are celebrating Israel's fruit, and we are celebrating the beginning of spring. It is an easy holiday to celebrate, because it is a holiday without restrictions.

"It is even more important because we have a problem to solve. We have to show the evil hands and minds that nothing will help them."

The organization is trying to make the telethon part of the holiday celebration, he said.

"We want as many people as we can get to take part in it. We are supplying kosher food and prizes, and we are trying to achieve an overall happy atmosphere. There is going to be a feeling of brotherhood – a feeling of doing things together."

Vered, who has gone out to many schools to present holiday activities, such as Tu b'Shvat seders and workbooks, wants students to get involved.

"We are supplying them with letters requesting that they buy trees, because we want every Jew to take part in the holiday.

"We've also had seders at York University, at youth groups and at synagogues. The parents and grandparents of these students were the ones that [helped plant the original trees]. We want the students to see the light that these people lit."

Cut fruit into small pieces. Combine and place in a medium-sized bowl. Cover with apple juice. Stir in cinnamon and liqueur. Refrigerate overnight. Spoon into small dessert dishes. Sprinkle with coconut, if desired.

TU B'SHVAT COUSCOUS FRUIT RING

1 package (1 lb.) instant couscous
20 pitted dates
20 almonds, halved
1 cup golden raisins
1 cup walnuts, ground
½ tsp. salt
grated peel and juice of 1 large orange
½ cup brown sugar, or to taste
2 tbsp. honey
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. brandy or fruit-flavored liqueur (optional)
2 tbsp. pomegranate seeds (optional)

Prepare couscous according to package directions. Fluff with a fork. Press into a ring mold. Turn out mold on to a decorative platter.

Fill each date with two almond halves and arrange in a circle atop couscous. Combine remaining ingredients. Arrange in the centre of the couscous mold. Sprinkle with pomegranate seeds, if available.

"It's the most meaningful thing I do."

In remembrance of things past

TORONTO — For Lore Dreyfuss Cymbalist, 90, it was a chance to show her children their German heritage.

But for Christiane Walesch-Schneller, a psychoanalyst and one of the organizers of a grass-roots German organization (the Förderverein), it was an opportunity for Jewish and non-Jewish survivors to mourn together in a way that has never happened before.

Lore, who was born in Breisach, Germany, travelled back to Germany with her two sons, Gil and Mark, and their wives, Ginny and Judy. The family was headed to the 60th anniversary of the deportation of the Jews from Breisach.

The trip was organized by the Förderverein, a group founded in November 1999 to commemorate the Jewish community by rebuilding Jewish sites. The group now has 150 European members and about 30 overseas members, most of them non-Jews.

While their first goal is to rebuild Jewish sites, "Our second goal is to establish new relations for survivors and their families," Walesch-Schneller said in an interview. "This is a big step forward.

"The aim is to commemorate the Jewish community, the families, and the murdered. We want to start with research – to collect memories, pictures and objects to put together the history and make it as vivid as possible."

The artifacts are to be eventually housed in a planned museum in the Gemeindehaus (Community House) in Breisach, which has recently been restored.

While the Cymbalists were in Breisach, they went to services at the Gemeindehaus, where Ralph Eisenman led the prayers.

Before Kristallnacht, the cantor of the Breisach synagogue was Michael Eisemann. After the synagogue was burned down, Michael continued to conduct services in his home, the Gemeindehaus, until he was eventually deported to Dachau.

After, Michael's son, Ralph, led the services until he managed to escape to Palestine at the age of 15 with the Kladovo-Transport, Ginny said.

"When Ralph led the services once again, in the same room, using the same old tunes, there wasn't a dry eye in the place," Gil said.

"In so many ways, it was a very emotional trip for my mother."

At night, Lore said that she would wake up and see things that weren't there anymore. The people and the city of Breisach Lore was born in were mostly destroyed.

Lore, who now lives in Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., lost 17 close family members in the Holocaust. She escaped Germany with her husband, Leonard, when they made their way to England by ship.

Lore and Leonard were in England during the Blitz, and by September 1939, they arrived in the United States and settled in Philadelphia, Pa. Not long after their arrival, Leonard served in the armed forces. Later, their two sons served.

Gil, who got married and settled in Sault Ste. Marie where he was stationed with the air force, said that for 60 years his mother never even bought a German product, let alone expressed any desire to go back to Germany.

But she changed her mind when they found out about this trip while exploring the family's genealogy.

"Yvonne Hill, the daughter of mom's first cousin, found us on the Internet," Gil said.

In less than a month, the Cymbalists found themselves in Breisach with other survivors and their memories.

One of the things Lore brought with her was a napkin ring. Lore's cousin, Else Dreyfuss, was a child who couldn't immigrate because she had TB. She and her mother were deported to Gurs where Else died in 1941.

During the war, Else learned to do beadwork and among the things she made was a napkin ring for Lore's mother, Bertha Loewenthal Dreyfuss.

When Bertha immigrated to the United States, she brought the napkin ring with her and it has been used for many years at the Cymbalist home. Lore brought the napkin ring and presented it to the Förderverein to be displayed in the planned museum.

The Cymbalists also spoke to high school students in Breisach.

"At first, I had a bad feeling towards all of them," Lore said. "You never know which one of their parents killed someone from my family. But really, these children had nothing to do with it. You can't blame them."

By the end of the meeting, Lore was impressed by the young people – their interest and their sincerity.

"They have a collective guilt about what their country did. They are dealing with their own survivor's guilt," Ginny said.

"So many initiatives, single people and groups, are getting together here in something we hope to develop as a model to be practised in other parts of the country," Walesch-Schneller said.

"We want to create language out of the silence that is common in German families. For us it is important to show that the [Jewish] families are not forgotten.

"We cannot change the past. But for our self-respect we want to open the house and our town for the survivors and their descendants so that they can feel welcome, explore their bitter past – and maybe the lighter moments as well."

Lore Cymbalist with her sons, Mark (left) and Gil, at the grave of Lore's father, Gustav Dreyfuss, in Germany.

Shul is second home for Beth David's new cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of Cantor Marshall Loomer's earliest public performances was a boyhood duet at age 14 with renowned cantor Misha Alexandrovich.

On February 10 Loomer will become the chazzan at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, the same synagogue Alexandrovich once served. "It's very humbling to know I'm standing where he once stood," said Loomer, 40, in a recent interview.

Cantor Marshall Loomer

The product of a traditional Jewish home, Loomer sang as a teenager in Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue's choir and in the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, but was a relative latecomer to the cantorate.

It wasn't until he was 32 and working in retail furniture sales that he began studying nusach and liturgical interpretation with Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple.

"I worked very hard," said Loomer, whose initial intent was to work part-time as a lay cantor. With Maissner's encouragement, he did "a lot of catching up" in areas like Hebrew, music and modes of nusach, and has been making time for study ever since.

After two years as assistant cantor to Beth Emeth's Cantor Louis Danto, Loomer took a full-time position three years ago at the 350-family unaffiliated Adath Sholom Synagogue, where he served as cantor, spiritual leader and ritual director.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus at Beth Emeth, served as Loomer's mentor as he dealt with life cycle events at Adath Sholom. Visiting hospital patients, nursing home residents and mourners brought particular satisfaction.

Last year, Loomer co-founded the Ontario Ritual Directors Association, an idea he and Beth David ritual director Asher Tannenbaum had both thought of independently. The organization, with which Loomer will continue to be affiliated, is developing standards for bar/bat mitzvah teaching.

Although Loomer's last official Shabbat at Adath Sholom is Feb. 3, he has also taken on some duties at Beth David in the past couple of months. (His predecessor, Cantor Yehuda Rottner, is now serving a congregation in Florida.)

Three weeks before his official move, Loomer's study at the 1,150-family Conservative synagogue already had personal touches – on his desk a CD of show tunes, and nearby, photos of his wife Karen, a graphic illustrator and designer, 14-year-old daughter Madeline, and family dog Barny.

In a way, Loomer's synagogue has always been his second home. As a kindergartner, he used to nap on the floor of the office at Beth Emeth while his mother Lorraine worked nearby.

His father Cy, a retired pharmacist, has been the volunteer librarian at Beth Emeth for 45 years. "Because of that, my access to books was tremendous," said the cantor.

Loomer's father introduced him to cantorial music.

"I played the recordings until the grooves were worn down," said Loomer, who also grew up listening to rock — most notably Frank Zappa, Carlos Santana and The Doors — and jazz. His brother, Martin, is a jazz musician, and their great-grandfather was a cantor in Poland.

Although he still enjoys a variety of music and likes to sing show tunes on occasion, Loomer is a traditionalist when it comes to services. He wouldn't be averse, however, to his daughter becoming a cantor if she chose to.

A member of the Cantorial Council of America (affiliated with Yeshiva University), Loomer, who sings in the tenor and baritone range, described his style as "interpreting the words rather than developing catchy tunes." Yet he wants to involve the congregation in singing and intends to introduce a number of chassidic melodies. He also plans to start a children's choir and institute davening classes.

As a teenager, Loomer attended Emery Collegiate Institute, where he studied violin, because of the school's reputation for its music program. An alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools, he also studied voice at the Royal Conservatory of Music, and placed second in a Kiwanis festival after only six voice lessons.

Although he always enjoyed going to shul, Loomer didn't want to become a cantor in his younger years. His father thought it would be a good choice for him at the time, he recalls.

A number of people thought that he was too old to take that route at 32, but "it goes to show you," Loomer said, "that if you put your mind to something and work very hard, you can do it."

JLI courses offered

TORONTO — The Jewish Learning Institute (JLI) is a new adult education program offering courses in Jewish history, mysticism, life-cycle events and the fundamentals of Jewish thought and practice.

The JLI offers a streamlined university-like curriculum meant to be accessible to people from all backgrounds and levels of Jewish knowledge.

The first course, Jewish Mysticism, will begin in February 2001, and continue for eight consecutive weeks. The inaugural course will be followed by Fundamentals of Jewish Thought and Practice, scheduled to begin May 2001.

Classes will be held at the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill and in the lower village at Forest Hill Collegiate. For more information, call Chabad Lubavitch at 905-731-7000.

Non-profits can profit from free 'g-clicks'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Why is a local dot.com company offering to help non-profit organizations with "viral" marketing, using e-mails?

To the uninitiated, a viral e-mail sounds like a distinctly unpleasant prospect. But marketers Phil Halpern, Terry Moshenberg and Luca Tonarini are finding a niche for that very technology, which they are in the process of patenting.

The three partners developed it about 1 1/2 years ago at the request of a client who wanted to send a television-type commercial by e-mail. In December, they began offering their services to non-profit organizations that provide raw material, such as already-filmed television commercials, waiving their usual fee of approximately $3,000 plus royalties.

"Tzedakah is a nice thing, and who better to help than non-profit organizations?" said Halpern, director of business development and a partner in the four-year-old marketing and public relations agency LaunchPad.com [www.killercreative.com] and its more recent offshoot GuaranteedClicks.com [www.guaranteedclicks.com].

"What better way to grow their donor base and get their story out than using and exploiting the Internet?"

The commercials are packaged as video clips and sent as e-mail attachments. The clips, stored in highly compressed Microsoft files designed not to accept computer viruses, automatically take the receiver to the advertiser's Web site.

The company also develops original content and shoots commercials from scratch, noted Halpern, whose background is in marketing and finance, in an interview in their north Toronto office.

Their clients have included such familiar names as CityTV, Ameritech and Nortel Networks.

A "modest" live-action shoot can run as low as $15,000, compared to six figures to shoot – not even to air – a 30-second TV commercial, noted Halpern. Turnaround time can be less than a month.

"Everyone today is getting a kick out of watching cool, high-tech things," Halpern said. Success is measured by noting the volume of traffic generated at the Web site through the "guaranteed clicks" or g-clicks, the term they came up with for the files.

The first organization to benefit was Artists Against Racism, whose television public service announcement with Len Lesser (Seinfeld's Uncle Leo) was one of several reformatted for the Internet.

If the clip is typical, it explains why someone might want to watch it instead of heading to the fridge, as some viewers do during television commercials. It's clever and edgy, and is likely to appeal to Seinfeld fans – legions of them – who would appreciate Lesser's sarcastically misanthropic monologue.

Some of the clips have been more provocative, pushing the envelope of what is permitted on television. The furthest they've gone, they said, is to show a delivery man puffing briefly on a joint.

"There's a demand for cool content," Halpern said, noting that more people have higher speed Internet access now.

"A neat little twist on that learning curve," said Moshenberg, the creative director, "is that it makes people who don't have high speed desire it." The g-clicks can be viewed without high-speed equipment, but the downloading time is affected.

Of course, if recipients aren't interested, they can delete the item or just not open the attachment. The kicker, for advertisers, is that e-mail recipients will forward clips they like to their mailing list.

"It's viral marketing," said Halpern. "We didn't invent it… It's all about permission-based e-mail as opposed to spam."

Once the process has begun, the distribution is "endless," said Moshenberg. "Friends, associates and colleagues are sending it to their friends, associates and colleagues."

Moshenberg and Tonarini (the multimedia director), both in their late thirties, and Halpern, at 48, are older than most of their Internet colleagues.

"The typical age is twenties," said Halpern. "But at the other end of the spectrum, seniors are discovering the web." Moshenberg receives e-mails from his wife's 93-year-old grandmother in Florida, he said.

"And obviously our generation will get older," said Halpern. "This is going to be everywhere."

RCMP veteran blazed trails for other women

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In her nine years in the RCMP, Frances Aronovitch Starr stared down a pipe-wielding drug dealer, served as a bodyguard for Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, met the Queen of England and had her cheeks pinched by Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin and his wife, Aliza.

Frances Aronovitch Starr

She also pulled a gun on a raccoon and, because of her diminutive stature, was asked to crawl through windows into dark basements where it was the mice she might encounter, not the bad guys, that really spooked her.

It was an exciting life for a young woman, one she wouldn't trade for anything. When she joined the force in 1975, she was a member of only the second cohort of women admitted into the service – and certainly the first Jewish woman to join.

Aronovitch Starr, 48, has recently added another first to her resume. In December she was named president of the RCMP Veterans' Association, the first woman to hold that prestigious position. Her appointment came after serving for five years on the executive of the Veterans' group.

"[Women's rights activist] Nellie McClung would jump out of her grave if she knew," Aronovitch Starr said of her latest move, heading what has traditionally been seen an old-boys organization.

A trailblazer in many respects, today Aronovitch Starr works as an investigator – another traditionally male occupation – with the RCMP as one of her clients.

It's all a little off the beaten track for a nice Jewish girl from Montreal, one whose police work opened her eyes to a world unlike anything she was familiar with.

"I was raised in Cote St. Luc. I didn't know that men got drunk, spent their pay cheques and beat their wives," she said.

If Aronovitch Starr's career path is unusual, there was a small indication early on that police and investigatory work appealed to her. Back in her 20s, she was working as a secretary for the head of MasterCard's security division when she was asked to co-operate with RCMP officers looking into a fraud case. Her work was sufficiently diligent that one of the RCMP officers suggested she apply to join the force.

The idea appealed to her. "I have a curious mind," she says, and she saw police work as a natural outlet for her skills.

Her family was supportive of the rather unusual move although her father wondered, if she was really interested in legal matters, why not apply to law school?

Instead Aronovitch Starr headed west to Regina where the RCMP holds its six-month boot camp for recruits. It was very much like joining the military, she said, with candidates put through their paces with strenuous physical training as well as academic work.

"The six months was the toughest thing I've ever done, but it was the most sustaining," she said.

Aronovitch Starr found that like her, the other recruits were idealistic, thinking "they'll change the world, make a difference and create respect for the law."

Graduation day, when she was given a gun and a badge "was such a proud moment," she recalled.

At the time, the female RCMP graduates faced skepticism, even some bias, from the entrenched male staff. However, Aronovitch Starr felt no discrimination because she was Jewish. She even recalls seeing a kippah-clad officer working in the force's drug squad.

As a constable in the RCMP's general investigations unit, she sought an assignment in the west. "I asked for the West. I got Hamilton, but I meant Vancouver."

She enjoyed the diversity offered in general investigations, where officers enforce various federal statutes. Occasionally she was assigned to the team that provided security at major international gatherings. It was at a G-7 meeting in Montreal one year that Aronovitch Starr, pulling the graveyard shift, heard a rustling in the bushes. She pulled her gun and was ready for the worst when a raccoon stepped out and looked at her with those typically quizzical, sad eyes.

On several occasions she served as one of Trudeau's bodyguards and driver. Other assignments while being seconded to the RCMP's VIP section included providing security for various heads of state and visiting dignitaries.

After leaving the force in 1984, Aronovitch Starr enrolled in university and earned a degree in psychology. She did some travelling and in 1994, she landed a position as a private investigator in a firm that includes herself and two associates, both of whom are former RCMP officers.

She performs due diligence work for corporate clients and she takes on divorce cases, tracking down hidden assets. She also does background checks for her old employer, the RCMP.

Aronovitch Starr has also worked with Stephen Spielberg's Shoah Foundation, helping in administrative tasks as well as interviewing 130 Holocaust survivors. Even though she told foundation officials she had experience interviewing the victims of violent crime, "I had to eat those words because it's totally different. I had never heard anything so horrific as a police officer."

Recently, Aronovitch Starr and her classmates held a 25th reunion. Some are still with the force, some took early retirement. Most who left the police are still working as investigators in some capacity.

Looking back on their lives, "we said, would we do it all again? We said, 'yeah, we would.' But we wouldn't go in with such naivete."

JPL exec. director dies

TORONTO — Rabbi Zelig (Zigmund) Wolkenstein, executive director of the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library, died last week of a heart attack at age 55, while in Baltimore for a conference of the Association of Jewish Outreach Professionals.

The rabbi had a congregation in the basement of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, until it merged a year ago with a small congregation run by Rabbi Avraham Bartfeld.

A Breslover Chassid, Rabbi Wolkenstein often referred to the teachings of Rabbi Nachman when running study groups.

Rabbi Shmuel Klein recalls his late brother-in-law as a soft-spoken man who touched the hearts of many. The funeral at Steeles College was standing room only.

Jerry Klasner, president of the library board, said Rabbi Wolkenstein's strengths were "as a teacher, an educator and a mentor, and how he went out of his way to help people."

An alumnus of Ner Israel Yeshiva, the rabbi was a principal at Ottawa's Hillel Academy Day School and rabbi of two American congregations before returning to his native Toronto. He ran the library for 23 years.

Rabbi Wolkenstein is survived by his wife Donna and children Michelle Braun of Montreal, Yossi, who lives in Flatbush, Chavi Lieberman, also of Flatbush, Yanky of Toronto and seven grandchildren, as well as his brother Albert, of Toronto.

We're a small conservative congregation with deep traditional roots. We're looking for an experienced davener to lead Shabbat services.

JCS receives Tzedek Hillel designation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto is the first Canadian affiliate of Hillel International to receive the organization's Tzedek Hillel designation.

Becoming a Tzedek Hillel site affords the Toronto campuses recognition and support for their social service programs, said Michelle Lackie, University of Toronto-based director of the Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

Affiliation to become official in September

The affiliation will become official in September, but programs are well under way for this year, and Lackie has had the opportunity to attend Tzedek Hillel meetings at a staff conference in December.

Social justice programming on Toronto campuses this year has included sandwich making for the homeless. Social action co-chairs at the University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union, Elana Weintraub and Jennifer Rotberg, arranged with major grocery chains to have the food donated, and students packed about 100 lunches, Weintraub said.

Weintraub, a third-year student who served as a JCS intern last summer, thinks that being awarded the Tzedek Hillel designation is "great."

She was particularly impressed by some of the imaginative programming she heard about at the Hillel International leadership retreat she attended last August. "I think it further inspires students to get involved if there's a title [like Tzedek Hillel].

"We want to plan more programs, but our main initiative is to get other students involved," Weintraub said. Although her fellow students are "always so busy with academic work," she believes they do care. "Once we plan the programs, it's no problem getting people to help."

A recent lunch-and-learn program included a presentation by Rachel Lasry of Ve'ahavta, the Jewish humanitarian organization, about tikkun olam and tzedakah.

In September, JCS will get $5,000 U.S. in funding from Hillel International, with the understanding it will match the amount.

The second year, the international organization will provide $2,500, and JCS will have to provide $7,500, Lackie said. The expectation is that the funding will ease the transition toward the local campus being self-sufficient.

Although the bulk of JCS' funding comes from Toronto's Jewish federation, the student organization is undertaking a fundraising campaign, Lackie said.

Current plans include having "Tzedek fellows" from local campuses to come up with and implement programs.

Lackie is serving as JCS' main Tzedek staff person and will be expected to devote 10 hours a week to Tzedek Hillel as part of her portfolio. "It's definitely a big chunk," she said. "We'll just reconfigure."

Reading week program planned

Over reading week, there will be a three-day program called Just Do It, running Feb. 18 to 20. About a dozen participating students will stay in a Toronto hostel and do community work, meet people in the community and learn about the connection between Judaism and helping people.

Lackie came up with the idea after hearing about similar ones on other campuses. "It's an amazing program," she said. "It's very important to me to stay in Toronto. We don't need to go to New York to see what's happening there. It's on our own doorstep."

The Tzedek Hillel goal embodies "partnership, advocacy, service and education in everything we do," said Lackie. "If you just volunteer in a soup kitchen without any education, it's just a feel-good project."

Obodzinski trial scheduled

MONTREAL — The trial of Walter Obodzinski, the second Montrealer to be accused in Federal Court of entering Canada under false pretenses after World War II, is scheduled to begin with a week of hearings July 16 in Montreal. Max Wolpert, acting deputy director of the Department of Justice's War Crimes Unit in Ottawa, said Crown prosecutors feel their case against Obodzinski is a solid one.

After the first week of hearings, legal teams will be fly to Belarus and Israel in early August to hear three weeks of testimony. Hearings in Montreal will resume in September.

HAMILTON JEWISH COMMUNITY SEEKS DYNAMIC EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

If you are well-organized, committed to Jewish communal life and education, and have a solid understanding of local and international Jewish issues, this position with the Hamilton Jewish Federation/UJA will be of interest to you.

Reporting to the volunteer Board of Trustees of the Federation, the successful candidate will be expected to live in the Hamilton area, with some occasional travel. Hamilton is a vibrant Jewish community of 4,000 with outstanding synagogues, day schools, kosher shopping and a JCC.

The ideal candidate enjoys meeting and working with others, raising funds for United Jewish Appeal and developing plans and programs to enhance our communal life.

This position requires solid experience and demonstrated skill at fundraising, the ability to follow through and complete tasks, excellent interpersonal skills, and the ability to forge and maintain long-term, positive relationships with community members. Computer literacy and superior language skills are also required.

Our small, dedicated staff will be supervised by the successful candidate. We also have a large cadre of volunteers, with whom the successful candidate will work closely.

Salary is commensurate with experience.

Please send your résumé by mail, including references, (no phone calls, please) to:
The Hamilton Jewish Federation,
1030 Lower Lions Club Rd., Ancaster, Ontario L9G 3N6
Attn: Search Committee

The closing date for applications is February 15, 2001

דיוקי ברוזה, 15 בפברואר

דיוקי ברוזה בנה לעצמו משבצת מאד ייחודית בין אמני הבמה הישראלית. למרות שחוא חי כבר שנים רבות בצפון אמריקה, לא דבקה בו תנפולת של תמנושות, זו שגרמה לרבים אחרים להפסיד את חקשר שלחם עם תקהל הישראלי. חוא עדיין מבוקש ואחוב מאד בארץ, ולא מייחסים לו "בגידה" על זת שחוא לא שם. וחעונג שחעניש בישראל את רן אלידן, עליחוי קאשי, אסתר עופרים ודיקה ודאי, לא חוטל עליו. דיוקי חוא אבן מרתק שמחדש את עצמו תמיד, ולראייה, יש מאחוריו כבר שבעה עשר תקליטים. דיוקי תחלים לא מכבר מתאונת דרכים קשה, שבה נפגעה ידו באורח קשה וחיתה חשש שלא יוכל לשוב ולנגן. אז חיתה חוא שוב כאן, לחמם לנו את חחורף ולחבטיח ש"יחיה טוב", ולספר על "חאשה שאיתי" ולמלק "סיגליות". רק

לחזוחירכם שאולם Leah Posiun חוא קטן במיוחד, ושרוב חכרטיסים כבר נמכרו. אז אללה ירצו ל"מתנה ג'ודאיקה". ברכות לצמד חשמונים (זר- אביב ושר), שממשיכים לדאוג לקוחילה שלחם שלא נשכח מאיפה באנו.

ערפאת לפי ליליאן

"תמיד נעים לקרוא את מדוכך, גידי, וחשבתי לשותף אותך בענין שעלה במחשבתי: חשם ערפאת חוא מחשורש ע.ר.פ. תנעתי למסקנה שכשמו כן חוא- נתן ערף, עורף ראשים, קשה ערף, ערפילי- ואם תבדוק במילון אבן שושן תמצא עוד מלים שלילוית בגידון. חמשך לעניין אותנו ותשמע בשורות טובות." ליליאן בן לולו.

מה יחיה

ללכת ב-zadie's shoes

אם אתם יכולים למצוא ערב פנוי לפני ח- 4 בפברואר, רוצו לראות את "חנעליים של סבא", חצגת שחיא כולח טורונטו וחנקודה היחודיח. לא, לא לחשוש, לא נושא דתי בכלל- עיקר חחצגח חוא על אמון בין אנשים, ועל חנושא של חתמכרות לחימורים. חמחזאי, אדם פטל, וחמחזאית ג'קי מאקסוול עשו עבודה יוצאת מן חכלל עם צוות מעולח. בימי ראשון יש חצגת צחריים בשעה שתיים, ובח משלם כל אחד לפי רצונו (מומלץ 10 דולאר), חחצגת ב-factory theatre (416-504-9971).

Shanghai haven exhibit unveiled in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – The Shanghai Connection, an exhibit highlighting the rescue efforts of Chinese and Japanese diplomats who helped Jews escaping pre-World War II Europe reach safety in Shanghai, was recently unveiled at Winnipeg's Jewish Heritage Centre.

Several Winnipegers whose family members were brought to Shanghai were on hand for the opening.

"My dad was in Sachsenhausen concentration camp," said Bert Schaffer. "The only way out was to have a fixed destination outside of Europe. My parents, Abe and Lottie, tried many countries. Only China would accept them."

Ralph Kuropatwa's mother and her parents arrived in Shanghai from Bavaria in 1939. His father had come to Shanghai from Belgium in 1936.

The Schaffer's, Kuropatwa's and many others owed their lives to the kindness of men like Dr. Feng Shan Ho, the Chinese consul general in Vienna and Chiune Sugihara,the Japanese consul in Kovno, Lithuania. The two men collectively saved the lives of 18,000 Jews by providing visas for entry into China.

Much of the the lecture and film-based exhibit focuses on the lives, careers and rescue efforts of the two diplomats.

The rest highlights Jewish life in Shanghai during the war years and the five Winnipeg families who have connections to Shanghai.

Kuropatwa was born in Shanghai in 1940. He remembers having a "cheerful" childhood and fondly recalls steaming, fragrant noodle carts at nightfall and fireworks. Kuropatwa recalls his father's excitement when the Americans bombed ammunition dumps in Honkew.

But not all memories are pleasant. "There was…the noisy Japanese soldier prodding my mother and I down the street at the point of a bayonet," he said.

Some of Miriam Gellert Feierstein's experiences in China were difficult.

Her father was forced to work in a Japanese munitions factory and the family lived in a Japanese ghetto. She also recalls the time in early 1945 when her mother asked her to take some food to her father at work. The seven-year-old was hit on the head with a rifle butt by a Japanese soldier at the factory gate.

Schaffer notes the Shanghai community had all the organizations you would normally find in a Jewish community. Feierstein, for example, attended a Jewish school in Shanghai. Meyer Zucker, who passed away 12 years ago, but was represented at the exhibit by his widow, Miriam, was actively involved in Yiddish socialist circles in Shanghai.

In general, the Jews of Shanghai found the Chinese people to be honourable and free of anti-Semitism.

"Until the Communists came to power, we had comfortable lives," said Ada Bronstein.

The Bronstein Family stands out from the other Winnipeg Jews who came from Shanghai. Ada and her late husband, Gregor, pre-dated the Jewish refugees in Shanghai by two decades.

Bronstein was born Ada Lvoff in Harbin, a city in Manchuria. Her parents, Russian Jews, came to Harbin to escape the Russian pogroms. Gregor, who passed away in 1984, was also born in Harbin. Ada Bronstein's father was a pharmacist with a drugstore first in Harbin. The Bronstein's moved to Shanghai in 1932.

"Life was comfortable for us," Bronstein recalls. "We always had three servants."

But the onslaught of Communism changed everything and Ada and Gregor left China for Canada. The rest of Ada's family headed for Australia.

The exhibit will run until the end of March and will include a panel discussion.

All the Jewish Winnipegers with a Shanghai connection are excited about having their stories told.

"I think the exhibition is great," said Miriam Feierstein. "It shows people what life was like there during the war. I hope that at least once before I leave this earth that I will be able to go back there."

Sask. settlement, cemetery turns 100

REGINA — In the spring of 1901, 100 Jews came from Romania to settle in the newly formed Jewish Agricultural Colony of Lipton in what was then part of the North West Territories.

Other settlers arrived later from Romania and Russia and made their home in the Lipton area, and together they fought disease, a harsh climate and poor farming conditions.

The residents quickly established a Jewish cemetery and had organized the first of three schools by 1905. Although many settlers left to seek a better life in larger centres, the Lipton colony remained a close-knit Jewish community throughout the Depression and World War II. The last burial in the Lipton Cemetery occurred in 1951.

The chevrah kadishah of Beth Jacob synagogue in Regina has taken on the responsibility for maintaining the cemetery in Lipton, a little over an hour's drive from Regina. The Jewish community here is planning a 100th anniversary commemorative celebration of the Lipton Jewish settlement and cemetery, to take place June 9 and 10.

The planning committee is also preparing a heritage package with historical information and personal immigration and biographical stories. We are seeking input from people who may have relatives living in this area or buried in the Lipton Jewish Cemetery, and we would appreciate any information that will help.

Please contact us by Feb. 15, if possible. Write to the Lipton Commemorative Jewish Celebrations Committee, Beth Jacob Synagogue, 4715 McTavish St., Regina, Sask., S4S 6H2; phone: 306-757-8643; or fax: 306-352-3499.

Finding irony in portraits

Cultural issues dominated the news last week. First, there was the flap about the flag being a rag that got everyone mad. Bernard Landry's feeble explanation about the bull was hardly convincing – but strangely, he may have been on to something. Bet you didn't know that bulls are colour-blind and it is the cape's motion rather than colour that attracts the charging bovine. Well, patriotic defenders of the red maple-leaf were sure charged!

Sheila Copps announced plans to buy and renovate the late Pierre Trudeau's Montreal mansion. Apparently, the czarina of all things Canadian felt that the art deco landmark should be declared a National Heritage site. Too bad Trudeau's estate was never contacted and has no intention of turning over the residence.

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

But we digress, for the real cultural news was from the minister for Canadian heritage who spoke of plans to alter another building, the former U.S. Embassy, just opposite the grounds of parliament. Plans are underway for converting the choice piece of real estate into a National Portrait Gallery where visitors can view and reflect on the great Canadians who have contributed in some way to this country's development. The cost attached to the initiative is estimated at $22 million, not a small bit of change.

Now, we should all be proponents of enhanced awareness of and appreciation for the exciting personalities that figure in Canadian history, but there is something wrong with this picture.

Not long ago, the government protested that it could not justify significant expenditures on museums at a time when programs were being slashed and Canada was getting its financial house in order. That was essentially the excuse for not honouring a commitment for a permanent Holocaust memorial.

Regardless of what form it might take – a stand alone museum as envisioned by some within the Jewish community, or as a central feature of a larger undertaking on the themes of tolerance – such a museum is as important for Canadian consciousness as any portrait of Louis Riel or Lord Nelson.

It's ironic that one will be able to view a portrait of Mackenzie King in all his prime ministerial glory, but not a glimpse of the misery caused by his government's intolerant rejection of Jews seeking refuge from Nazism.

Perhaps placing the one in the spotlight is partially intended to help keep the other in the shadows.

Researchers find gene that causes dysautonomia

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Researchers at Massachusetts General Hospital (MGH) have identified the gene that causes familial dysautonomia (FD).

The research team, under the direction of James Gusella, director of the molecular neurogenetics unit and Bullard professor of neurogenetics at Harvard Medical School, and Susan Slaugenhaupt, instructor of neurology at Harvard Medical School, has shown that mutations in a gene named IKBKAP cause the disease.

The findings will be published in the American Journal of Human Genetics.

The immediate result of this discovery. Gusella was quoted as saying in a media release from MGH, will be the ability to do carrier testing of anyone in the general Jewish population, rather than just known at-risk families.

The team has also found that "the expression of the mutant gene in FD patients varies depending on what cell types are examined."

They discovered that some patient cell types show normal protein development despite the mutation. Slaugenhaupt suggested that by investigating this mechanism, they may learn how to increase the amount of normal protein made in nerve cells, "which could lead to a treatment for the progressive nerve loss seen in FD."

Deb Melamed Wener, whose eight-year-old daughter Alanna has the disease, and who was interviewed for the recent CJN article on FD, said that everyone is "really excited. It is great news – it's been a long time coming."

She is especially happy about the improved therapies that it appears will be possible, and about the testing for carriers. "Now it is important to get that testing to Canada," she said.

Familial dystautonomia is a disease of the sensory and autonomic nervous systems that affects the Ashkenazi Jewish population. One in 30 Ashkenazi Jews carries the FD gene and about one in 3,600 individuals is affected.

Symptoms include difficulty swallowing, leading to the necessity of tube feedings; trouble controlling heart rate and blood pressure; poor reaction to pain; and spinal curvature. A media release from MGH estimated that only about 50 percent of patients live to be 30 years old, in spite of advances in medical treatment.

The research team also includes scientists and physicians from the Dysautonomia Treatment and Evaluation Center at New York University (NYU), the National Institutes of Health, Hadassah-Hebrew University Hospital in Israel, and the Max-Delbruck-Centrum for Molecular Medicine in Germany. Support has come from the Dysautonomia Foundation, the National Institutes of Health, the Israeli Science Ministry and the U.S.-Israel Binational Science Foundation.

In a related development, an organization of parents of children with FD has announced that it will provide up to $1 million in grants per year to support research for the development of a cure for the disease.

It also announced that screening programs are being set up at NYU and Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York and at Hadassah-Hebrew University Hospital in Israel for all potentially at-risk people.

COMMUNITY SERVICE: Four grade 10 CHAT students recently visited Mount Sinai Hospital. As part of their career assignment in community service, they chose to study the Isabel Silverman Canada International Scientific Exchange Program. About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am formula-feeding my infant and I sometimes switch between using the liquid and the powder of the same brand. Is it OK to do this?

A. Yes, it's perfectly OK. There is sometimes a slight difference in taste that your baby may detect, but there is no reason not to do whatever is more convenient. Just be aware of the varying expiry dates on liquid vs. powdered formulas once they are opened, and if you are switching between the two, ensure that you use up the formula or discard it before those times have elapsed.

Q. My son loves cucumber. Is it at all nutritious?

A. Actually, yes. Most kids do seem to love cucumbers, which have some healthful benefits. An eight-inch piece of cucumber contains less than 40 calories, along with two grams of protein, no fat, three grams of fibre and some vitamins. Enjoy!

PM halts talks after angry Arafat speech

by ALUF BENN and ORA COREN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Barak halted peacemaking contacts with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority until after Israel's election next week, his office said last Sunday.

But in an official statement, his office added that, "Security contacts for [purposes of] calming the situation on the ground, stopping the violence and thwarting terrorism will continue."

Barak decided not to meet Arafat for a summit in Sweden after the Palestinian leader made a speech yesterday at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, accusing Israel of waging a "barbaric war" against the Palestinians and of using prohibited weapons and ammunition "that include in their composition depleted uranium."

The allegation of using depleted uranium against the Palestinians during the recent intifadah was immediately denied by Israel.

Barak informed Sweden's leaders and UN Secretary General Kofi Annan of his decision to stop meetings between Israeli and Palestinian officials relating to peace negotiations, his office said.

Foreign Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami, Justice Minister Yossi Beilin and Director General of the Prime Minister's Office, Gilad Sher, favoured holding the summit, and Ben-Ami even announced the meeting during a press conference at the end of five days of Israeli-Palestinian talks in Taba last Saturday.

Ben-Ami favours "internationalizing" the diplomatic process. He believes Israel needs international backing to cushion it against the lack of stability on the Palestinian side. He thinks Israel needs to undergo a fundamental change in its attitude toward international intervention.

This was why he favoured holding a meeting with Arafat under European Union and UN auspices, without the participation of the United States, which has declared it would not take part in any actions that could be construed as intervention in the Israeli election process.

The new administration of President George W. Bush has recently been taking a fresh look at U.S. Middle East policy.

The statement released on Jan. 28 by Barak's office, cancelling the meeting with Arafat, stated, "The Israeli government continues to stand by the peace process on the basis of insistence on Israel's vital interest."

In his blistering verbal attack on Israel, Arafat told the audience, which included Annan, "The current government of Israel is waging and has waged for the past four months a savage and barbaric war as well as a blatant and fascist military aggression against our Palestinian people."

Appearing on a panel that included Minister for Regional Co-operation Shimon Peres, Arafat also made the accusation about Israel's use of ammunition containing depleted uranium.

Western Europe has recently been swept by fears that cases of cancer among peacekeeping troops in the Balkans could be linked to NATO's use of depleted uranium weapons.

Arafat said Israeli actions had cost the Palestinian economy $2.5 billion, but insisted he remained committed to the peace process.

Peres, whose opening comments were far more upbeat and conciliatory, seemed taken aback by Arafat's tone. Peres insisted Israel's crackdown was solely in self-defence and that Israel remained committed to finding a lasting peace.

Arafat may well have aimed his vituperation against Israel to gain points with the Palestinian masses at home, but he failed to impress the world leaders at the meeting.

"To think of such a man leading a state is truly frightening," said one member of the illustrious audience after the panel discussion.

Leaders look past election

Ranking members of Sharon's campaign staff are concerned about a possible political backlash stemming from the outspoken remarks of far-right, National Union-Yisrael Beitenu party members, who are likely candidates for ministerial portfolios in a new government.

Likud MK Meir Sheetrit, who is handling press and public relations matters for the Sharon campaign, told Ha'aretz last night: "If the extreme right hasn't learned a thing from 1999 when it caused [Benjamin] Netanyahu's downfall and Barak's [victory], then we have a problem. I urge them to exercise restraint and hold their tongues, because they cause damage."

Adding that the positions of Lieberman and Ze'evi "are not the Likud's policy line," Sheetrit confirmed that he favours the formation of a national unity government.

Other top Likud politicians expressed concerns yesterday that moderate figures such as Centre party MKs Dan Meridor and Roni Milo would refuse to form a narrow-based government under Sharon that features far-right figures, such as the National Union-Yisrael Beitenu MKs. Meridor has declared recently that he won't take part in a new government that stops negotiations with the Palestinians.

Britain holds first Holocaust day

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain observed its first national Holocaust Memorial Day last Sunday with ceremonies across the country and a service in London that also honoured victims of other 20th-century genocides.

Children in Wales composed personal messages for those killed in the century's atrocities, a town in western England honoured a son who issued visas to Jews fleeing Nazi Germany, and London's Imperial War Museum screened films about Nazis.

The guest list for a special service at Westminster Central Hall in London included Prince Charles, Prime Minister Tony Blair, the archbishops of Canterbury and Westminster and Britain's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks.

The ceremony included tributes to survivors of violence in Cambodia, Bosnia and Rwanda, as part of an effort to make the day a broad lesson about the consequences of intolerance. It came on the 56th anniversary of the 1945 liberation of Auschwitz, which is commemorated around Europe.

"It's so important... to remember," said Holocaust survivor Gena Turgel after a service in Edinburgh, Scotland. "Atrocities should never be allowed to happen to any person, any group of people, any colour or religion, any nationality."

In Germany, flags flew at half-mast on government buildings for the annual Day of Remembrance for Victims of Nazism. A sharp rise in violent neo-Nazi attacks on minorities this year gave the day added resonance.

Germany's commemorative events took place at the site of the planned national Holocaust memorial, close to the Reichstag and the Brandenburg Gate in the heart of Berlin. Anti-racism campaigners lit thousands of candles.

Italy held its first Holocaust Memorial Day with a ceremony in Milan organized by Italian unions, and a moment of silence was planned during evening soccer games. Padua, in northern Italy, honoured Giorgio Perlasca, a butcher credited with having saved more than 5,000 Italian Jews by pretending to be a Spanish diplomat.

Italian President Carlo Azeglio Ciampi acknowledged Italy's blame in the Holocaust, calling Benito Mussolini's racial laws a betrayal of the country's founding principles.

About 7,000 Jews were deported from Italy during the Holocaust, and 5,910 of them died.

"But numerous Italians knew how to further the demands of their conscience against the violence of the dictator," Ciampi said.

In Sweden, Prime Minister Goeran Persson attended a ceremony at a Stockholm synagogue.

Melchior slams UK chief rabbi over Mount remarks

By SHARON SADEH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Michael Melchior, minister of Diaspora relations, last Friday expressed sharp criticism of recent comments by the United Kingdom's Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks.

In a letter to Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, Rabbi Sacks asserted that the governments of Israel have no right to decide on the sovereignty of the Temple Mount.

In an interview with the British weekly, The Jewish Chronicle, Rabbi Melchior said, "If someone wants to make political decisions which impact on Israel, it is appropriate that he move to Israel, become a citizen and vote in the elections. Only those who really care about Israel have the right to intervene on the fundamental issues of the state."

He added that "we must listen to differing opinions, but at the end of the day, the final decisions are being taken by the elected governments of Israel."

CORRECTION

In an article in last week's CJN on the exhibit of Syrian-Jewish artifacts in Israel, it was stated that former Israeli consul general to Toronto, Jehudi Kinar, arranged a meeting with Israeli President Moshe Katsav and Judy Feld Carr.

In fact, Kinar arranged for the shipping of some of the artifacts to Israel. The meeting between Carr and Katsav was arranged by the current consul general, Meir Romem.

Chief Rabbi demands state probe of digging on Mount

By NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliahu Bakshi-Doron last week demanded that Prime Minister Ehud Barak set up a commission of inquiry to investigate what kind of digging is really being done on the Temple Mount.

All digging on the Mount should be frozen until the commission has completed its work, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron added. He issued this call following an open meeting with the Committee to Prevent the Destruction of Antiquities on the Temple Mount, which was attended by several other rabbis.

At the meeting, Shmuel Berkowitz, a committee member, said the committee has photographs taken in the last few days, showing a section of the tunnel that the Wakf (Muslim religious trust) has started to build between the ruins of the ancient Al Aksa Mosque and Solomon's Stables. However, he said, the pictures cannot be released because they might endanger the life of the source who supplied them.

"The committee has pictures that incontrovertibly demonstrate activity under the Al Aksa Mosque, activity that is destroying archaeological remains," said another committee member, archaeologist Gabi Barkai. "I would be happy to go to the site with the police, who are having trouble locating these things, and show them what we are talking about."

Another committee member, Yisrael Caspi, charged that both Barak and Public Security Minister Shlomo Ben-Ami are perfectly aware of the "troubling reality on the Mount," but prefer to ignore it.

According to Barkai, the Wakf has paved thousands of square metres of the mount. This in itself would have caused no harm, he said, except that "in preparation, they lowered the level of the Mount by many dozens of centimetres, thereby damaging antiquities from the days of the First Temple, the Hasmonean Kingdom, the Herodian period and the Roman, Christian and Muslim periods."

In another area of the Mount – the "Ramah" region where the Dome of the Rock is located, and where many believe the Temple formerly stood – the Wakf is raising the floor, and this also damages antiquities, Barkai said.

Eilat Mazar, an archaeologist affiliated with Hebrew University, stressed that the committee, which is made up of people from all parts of the political spectrum, has one concern: preventing the destruction of antiquities on the Mount. "For more than a year, we have been requesting a meeting with Prime Minister Barak, without success," she added.

At the meeting, Rabbi Bakshi-Doron was also asked about the rabbinical committee set up to look into the possibility of establishing a synagogue on some part of the Temple Mount. He replied that, in his opinion, as well as in those of most members of the Chief Rabbinical Council, that such a setup is not feasible, because Jews are not allowed to set foot even on the margins of the Mount.

When fiction poses as fact

According to Reports

At an important CBC symposium a few years ago under the heading Journalism and the Politics of Identity, highly respected Canadian writer and journalist Michael Ignatieff implored his colleagues to go beyond merely balancing competing viewpoints and to ensure that they establish "what the facts of the case are." This also meant, he said, "to refuse the... contention of identity politics" that there are no facts, only competing claims (with the final word typically going to the weaker party no matter how invalid the argument).

Unless we refuse the "relativization of truth," Ignatieff warned, "we might as well pack up and go home. There are facts, they can be established, they can be discerned, they can be presented."

Journalists who refuse to establish the facts, Ignatieff suggested, are being irresponsible, not just lazy.

Yet, day after day, we read in newspapers and magazines, hear on the radio and see on TV that, for instance, UN Resolution 242 "demands" Israel's unilateral withdrawal from "the" territories, that Resolution 194 "enshrines" the Palestinian "right of return" to present-day Israel and that this "right" is bound by international law, that in 1948 war "broke out" between Israel and a number of Arab states, and so on – all wrong. All factually wrong.

By the force of repetition, these and a multitude of related claims posing as fact gain an acceptance and legitimacy that is completely undeserved. To be sure, many such claims are often "balanced" by Israeli experts and others scrupulously (if unsensationally) asserting the facts, only to be followed a day or so later by the most egregious violation of the facts as part of unrelenting anti-Israel polemics.

I am speaking here about basic, irrefutable truths, not simply about differing interpretations of key events which are the lifeblood of intellectual debate and growth. There must be respect for intellectual integrity that demands that in the course of the debate no violation of irrefutable facts will be tolerated.

Historian Tony Judt, echoing Ignatieff's sentiments, was dead right in his article called Writing History, Facts Optional in the New York Times, April 13, 2000:

"Some statements are true, some are false. Some writers have integrity and are to be believed, however outlandish their opinions. Others are knowingly disseminating seductive falsehoods. Most people are good. And some are evil."

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

PA violence is political tactic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

"War is nothing but the continuation of politics by other means," Karl von Clausewitz, the Prussian military theorist, wrote.

Von Clausewitz's famous dictum is clearly applicable to the current Palestinian uprising.

The Palestinian Authority (PA), under the leadership of Yasser Arafat, has resorted to violence in order to extract further political concessions from Israel.

Although the PA has made a point of conducting negotiations with Israel to try to resolve final status issues, Arafat and his lieutenants have let it be known that the intifadah will continue until Palestinian goals are met.

Prime Minister Ehud Barak has offered Arafat unprecedented territorial concessions and a measure of shared sovereignty in eastern Jerusalem. But Arafat believes he can wrest still more concessions from Israel by pursuing the uprising, currently in its fourth month.

Israel is under no illusions what it is up against. Gen. Shaul Mofaz, the chief of staff, has warned that this low-grade conflict could last at least a year. Ephraim Sneh, the deputy defence minister, put it more bluntly. "We are at war with the PA," he declared recently.

Though confined almost exclusively to the West Bank and Gaza, the intifadah has spilled into Israel in the form of several suicide bombings and shootings perpetrated by Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Fatah.

Reports suggest that the intifadah is running at a lower intensity today than in its formative stage in October and November. Indeed, violent incidents have decreased by 70 percent of late.

Yet the death toll, which stands at 375 (318 Palestinians, 43 Israeli Jews, 13 Israeli Arabs and a German national), is rising. Last week, following the murder of a 16-year-old Jewish boy near Ramallah and of two Tel Aviv restaurateurs in the Tulkarm area, an Israeli Jew was killed in Jerusalem.

The character of the intifadah has also changed. Stone-throwing incidents have become relatively rare, while road-side bombings and shootings are now commonplace.

Concentrating their fury on Jewish settlers and soldiers, the Palestinians have targeted cars, buses and convoys, settlements, army positions and bypass roads, all in a bid to uproot settlements and eject Israel from the territories.

The Jordan Valley, once a tranquil haven, has been affected by the uprising as well. Crops have been uprooted, greenhouses vandalized and roads attacked.

It appears that the settlements, particularly the isolated ones, are security liabilities rather than assets.

Having transformed the territories into danger zones where Jewish lives are in constant peril, the Palestinians have "Lebanonized" the conflict in the West Bank and Gaza. Last week, in an incident reminiscent of Hezbollah's successful tactics in southern Lebanon, Hamas set off a bomb next to a Merkava tank in Gaza, wounding a soldier. Subsequently, Hamas distributed a video recording of the assault.

It is unclear whether Arafat wants to intensify the intifadah. But he may do so if the last-ditch talks in Taba fail, or if Ariel Sharon defeats Barak in the Feb. 6 prime ministerial election.

Meanwhile, Fatah leaders Marwan Barghouti and Hussein Sheikh – who enjoy a wide following among younger Palestinians – have repeatedly urged Arafat to escalate the uprising, and not to renew security co-operation with Israel, severed shortly after Sharon touched off the intifadah with his visit to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

Two weeks ago, the Israeli media reported that security co-ordination had been resumed. But it remains to be seen whether it has actually gone into effect.

Israel, in trying to squelch the uprising, has imposed punishing closures on the West Bank and Gaza and assassinated mid-level Fatah and Hamas activists.

These measures have devastated the Palestinians, damaging their economy and partially decimating their leadership.

Both sides realize that that the current impasse can only be broken through diplomacy, not war.

E-mail rumours are not to be trusted

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — On the Internet, information travels at the speed of light – whether it's true or not.

Among the vast quantity of rumours, tall tales and urban myths circulating at any one time is an e-mail chain letter that calls on readers to boycott McDonald's restaurants. The reasons for the boycott vary, depending on the mail message received.

In one version, the letter claims 60 Saudi Arabian McDonald's franchises are donating 30 percent of the their hamburger sales to "the Palestinian intifadah against the Israelis."

In another, the money is to go to "Palestinians injured in the occupied territories."

McDonald's Corporation has responded with a news release saying the restaurants celebrated the month of Ramadan by donating a percentage of every "Value Meal" sold to the Red Crescent Society and a children's hospital in Gaza. The donation was "part of an on-going commitment by our independent Saudi partners to raise money for organizations that support worthy children's causes," the release states.

The U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) is satisfied with that explanation.

"As far as the ADL is concerned, if a Saudi Arabian wants to donate part of their money to a hospital, that's a humanitarian gesture," said Myrna Shinebaum, national spokesman for the ADL.

"Certainly, on the issue of McDonald's, there's no reason to boycott it."

Shinebaum said the Internet chain letter "is another case of e-mail running amok… People put it on the Internet and it's taken on a life of its own."

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our sixth annual Purim Art Contest.

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN on March 8. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colourful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Feb. 19, 2001. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors, such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat, Friday, March 2, 2001.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 8, 2001. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

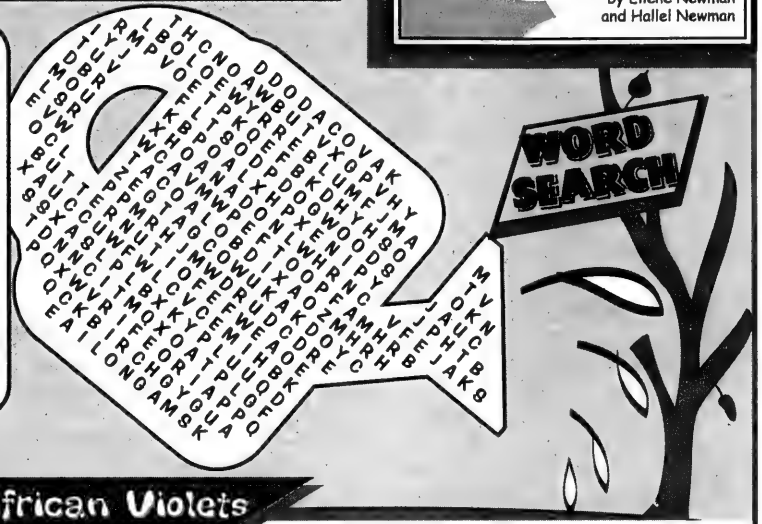
On Tu B'Shevat we celebrate the gift of trees. How many of these tree names can you find?



African Violets

"Sarena Abigail Willner!" cried Mrs. Willner, "What is my African violet doing in the linen closet?"

"Ummm . . . it's on vacation?"

"Sarena, I told you to water it three times a week."

"I kept forgetting, and I thought you wouldn't find it there."

"Well, now it's dead. I am very disappointed in you, young lady. I trusted you to — oh, the school bus is here. We'll talk later."

* * * * *

Sarena had difficulty concentrating in class until her teacher, Morah Rachel, announced, "As you know, today is Tu B'Shevat. God gave us beautiful trees and flowers to use and enjoy, and we have a mitzvah to take care of all His creations. Later on we'll be planting a sapling with the third grade, but right now we have a special treat."

Morah Rachel took a large white box from the storage cabinet and put it down on the work table by the window. Everybody stared at the box, trying to guess what was inside. "Liana's mother, Mrs. Frydman, donated these lovely African violets to our class." Morah Rachel uncovered the box and continued, "We are going to pot them, and when school ends today we can take them home."

Sarena couldn't take her eyes off the flowers. African violets. A few of them looked exactly like the one she had at home — well, the one she used to have at home.

"Sarena, you are sitting so nicely that you may be the first to choose your flower."

Sarena, jolted from her reverie, slowly walked to the work table and chose a plant. It looked just like the one she hadn't watered at home, except it had a little tag on it that said "Frydman's Indoor Garden Center."

Sarena carefully placed some potting soil in a terra cotta pot, and set the pot on a saucer. Then she added the plant. She added a pinch of powdered fertilizer to a cup of warm water and watered it.

"Sarena!" exclaimed the teacher. "I see you know all about taking care of African violets!"

Sarena cupped the little pot in her hands and returned to her seat.

"Things like this don't just happen," she thought. "They happen for a reason. And I think I know just what that reason is."

* * * * *

Sarena jumped off the step of the school bus and ran into her house. "Mom, I'm home! And I have a present for you!"

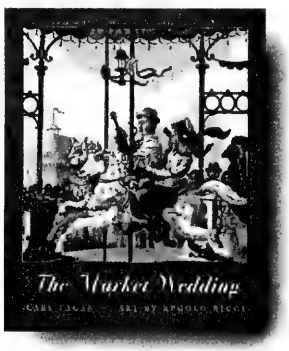
'Fish for sale'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It is always fun to read stories that are set in your own home town, or a town that you know a lot about. There aren't a lot of books that are set in Canadian cities, so when we do see one, it is really special.

The Market Wedding, by Cary Fagan (Tundra Books, McClelland & Stewart, 2000), adapted from an old story by Abraham Cahan, is set in Kensington Market in downtown Toronto. Although it is now full of Oriental, West Indian and many other kinds of stores, for many years it was almost completely a Jewish area. Some people had stores, and others sold from carts in the streets.



Morris and Minnie, the hero and heroine of The Market Wedding, sold things in the market. Morris owned a fish stall, and Minnie sold many different kinds of hats from a cart. They used to get customers by yelling out to people walking down the street. Morris would yell "Fish for sale! Right out of the lake!" and Minnie would call out "Hats for sale! Straight from Paris!" (Her hats probably didn't come from Paris, where the most elegant women's clothing came from, but she probably thought that made her stock sound fancier.)

The two of them realized that they were in love, and decided to get married. The trouble was that they were both very poor. Morris wanted Minnie to have all the wonderful things that movie stars had. "You should sit in the finest chair, eat from the most delicate china plates, sleep in the softest bed," he told her.

He came up with what he thought was a wonderful plan. They would take all the money that they had, and make the fanciest wedding anyone in Kensington market had every seen. "We'll spend every penny," he told Minnie.

The idea was that when their friends realized how fancy the wedding would be, they would feel obligated to buy them the finest furniture, lamps, silverware and things like that. Minnie was very suspicious (well, wouldn't you be?) but went along with Morris.

They ordered invitations with gold ink, hired the Casa Loma orchestra, and rented a huge hall and hired the most expensive caterer in town. They even hired a servant in a fancy red suit to deliver the invitations and to drive them to their wedding at a fancy synagogue.

Well, what do you think happened? Their friends, who were very ordinary people, were too embarassed to come to such an elegant affair. The only guests were an old couple who they met in the street.

They both felt very silly. Not only that, but they realized that they had no money to buy anything for their new home. They even had to walk back from the reception.

Who do you think they met when they got to their apartment? That's right – all their friends came to meet them, and they had a wonderful party right there. When they realized that Minnie and Morris didn't have anything, everyone chipped in to help them out.

The newlyweds realized, "Nothing was new or fancy or fit for a movie star, but all of it was precious to them."

The pictures, by Regolo Ricci, are based on what Kensington Market might have looked like in the 1920s.

You will really enjoy this story, and so will your parents and grandparents who remember the Market.

Zygote taking 'baby steps' on the road to professional success

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — Anyone who follows the local music scene knows that bands come and go rapidly. Pick up a club-listing from a few years ago and few of the bands listed then would be around today.

One of the few exceptions is Zygote. They played their first gig in 1992 and since then have been going strong with a unique sound that combines funky grooves, heavy guitars, sweet melodies and a driving rhythm section — something close to The Red Hot Chili Peppers.

Last year they released their first CD Turning Gyge's Ring, and recently played to over 600 people at The Opera House. And it just happens the five members are Jewish.

"Being Jewish just happened pretty randomly from growing up in the same area," percussionist Daniel Shlag, 25, said recently. The CHAT graduate joined the band five years ago. He plays a combination of bongos, congas, and other percussive instruments.

Shlag recently travelled to Ghana to study percussion at the African Academy of Arts and Music, as he never had any professional training. "It's unfortunate that music was never encouraged at CHAT," he says.

"[Studying in Ghana] helped me bring a different flavour to the band and gave me different skills that I've found useful."

Zygote's other members are – like Shlag, they're all on a one-name basis – Aaron (guitar), Brian (drums), Jeremy (vocals and guitar), and Amir (bass and vocals). Although they have some similar influences, they have varied musical backgrounds.

"Our spark comes from our different influences; this gives us our unique sound," Shlag said. "We have a nice mixture of great harmonies and heavy guitars. It's hard to classify us into a specific category."

Shlag admits that when it comes to selling themselves to record company executives and radio stations, being hard to classify hasn't been helpful.

"We've had a lot of frustration with Canadian labels who don't want to touch anything they can't classify."

But that doesn't mean Zygote's about to change their sound anytime soon. If they change to satisfy record companies, "then we won't be happy playing what we play," Shlag notes.

Shlag admits the music business is not an easy one, especially for an independent act, and doesn't imagine success is going to come overnight.

"We're all ready and waiting [to turn pro]," he said. "It's what we've dreamed and hoped for, for a long time. We know that the reality is there's not one gig that's gonna make it for us. We're still taking baby steps and that success is a long way away."

Zygote's CD has gone into its fourth pressing, and they sell out the Rivoli (a downtown club) on a monthly basis.

But selling their music to record companies and radio stations has been tough. Zygote recently signed with The Incredible Management Group to help facilitate that road to success.

"We've brought ourselves to where we are now on our own. But if you don't have your material solicited by a manager, it's hard to get anybody to listen to you."

Zygote's fanbase is very loyal. At one time many of them travelled to Hamilton for one concert and then back to the Rivoli for another show the same evening."Our fan loyalty freaks us out," Shlag said. "We try to be as good to them as possible."

Zygote has an impressive website—www.zygotemusic.com—and a mailing list to keep fans informed about upcoming gigs. "We stay in close contact with everybody."

Shlag notices a community of followers developing over the years. "Our fans seem very friendly with each other. Many have become friends through seeing Zygote."

He attributes some of their success to their high intensive energy on stage.

"We're definitely not a mellow jazz band where you can talk to your girlfriend during the show," Shlag said.

"We demand that all eyes and ears are on us at all times, otherwise we're not satisfied. We have a bit of an ego problem that way."

In order to keep their fans' attention, Zygote changes their set often. At a gig last November they set up white and red drapery illuminated by black lights framing the stage, Chinese paper lanterns hanging from the ceiling, a starfield of white Christmas lights floating above the band and tables packed with candles.

Shlag says that's all the work of the band's "invisible sixth member," Josh Cappell. "He does our artwork, our website, and our stage setup. He's done some crazy stuff with candles, lights and smoke. Our lack of funds have forced him to be very creative."

NCSY PLAY A COMBINATION OF HUMOUR AND SPIRITUALITY

The Young Leadership Division of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth presents Second Chances, a comic and dramatic play by Matt Okin and Michael Gurin that combines Jewish spirituality and Jewish humour.

Second Chances tells the story of a father and son reconnecting after many years of estrangement who find themselves exploring their similarities and differences.

"It's their differences that provide the humour along with the dramatic tension," says Nechama Stern, chairperson of the Young Leadership Division.

The play delivers "cutting edge, spiritually relevant entertainment for everyone," says Okin, who is directing the Toronto performance. In part, the play is about "honouring one's parents, even when it's difficult," Gurin says.

NCSY classifies the play as "mainstream off-Broadway" material. Leah Posluns Theatre, Sunday Feb. 25. Tickets are $20 for general admission ($100 sponsor, $36 VIP). For information please call Nechama Stern, 416-789-9293, or NCSY, 905-761-6279, ext. 32.

The Spirit Transcendent: Wit, a "powerful yet defiantly funny" play by elementary schoolteacher Margaret Edson, focuses on an English professor's struggle to understand the meaning of life after being diagnosed with cancer. At its centre lies the notion that an extraordinary spirit can transcend death.

Edson wrote Wit, her first and only play, after working in a hospital with cancer and AIDS patients. It premiered in California in 1995, has been produced all over the world, and has won many awards, including a 1999 Pulitzer.

CanStage's Toronto production, starring Seana McKenna, previews Feb. 12 to 14 and runs Feb. 15 to March 10. Bluma Appel Theatre, St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts. Tickets $20 - $60. 416-368-3110 or 416-372-1111. Web site: www.canstage.com.

At the Galleries: New works by painter Pat Fairhead, including North West Passage, are on view Feb. 10 through 28. Gallery One, 121 Scollard St. 416-929-3103. Web site: www.galleryone.ca.

• An exhibit with selections of work from the last decade by artist Judy Singer, whose drawings are about "touching the edge of a shape," is at the Moore Gallery, 80 Spadina Ave., Suite 404. Feb. 3 to 24. 416-504-3914.

New in Print: Hannah Arendt (1906-1975), the German-Jewish intellectual who left Germany in 1933, is known to readers as the author of Eichmann in Jerusalem, The Origins of Totalitarianism and other works. Scholar Julia Kristeva has given a series of lectures at the University of Toronto about Arendt and her life and philosophy.

Kristeva's lectures have been collected and published as Hannah Arendt: Life Is A Narrative (University of Toronto Press, 100 pp., $18.95). This heavily philosophical and intellectualized book should prove of great interest to serious students of Arendt.

Buddies dishes up Rhubarb

TORONTO — Buddies in Bad Times Theatre is presenting its 23 annual Rhubarb Festival from Feb. 7 to Feb. 25, featuring over 20 new theatrical works, peep shows, celebrity debates and parties.

Anna Chatterton

Among the events are performances of The Regina Monologues, written by and starring Shoshana Sperling, a regular writer and performer on Vision TV's Skylight. Sperling has been compared to Andrea Martin and Lily Tomlin.

Another play to be performed, hey rea, hey rea, is written by Anna Chatterton. Readers may remember the play, The Wise Shoemaker of Studena, directed by Chatterton, which recently ran at the Leah Posluns theatre. Chatterton teaches drama at the Bloor JCC.

Both plays run during the third week of the festival, from Feb. 21 to Feb. 25, starting at 7:30 p.m.

Each evening will kick off with Curtain Raisers, a melee of teasers on the mezzanine of Tallulah's Cabertet. From there, audiences will explore the various stages throughout Buddies in Bad Times Theatre. Tickets are $15 per night, $20 per week and $40 for a festival pass. Buddies in Bad Times, 12 Alexander St., Toronto. For further information and reservations, call 416-975-8555.

Postering campaign helps keep Zygote above the crowd

An example of some of the poster art you will see stapled all over Queen Street West.

In order to keep their live set fresh, Zygote don't overexpose themselves. "We play at the Rivoli about once a month. It's hard to maintain the whole entertainment aspect without making it appear stale if we played more often," he said. It also might save some trees and keep some parts of Queen Street clean.

"We have a crazy postering campaign" Shlag explains. While some bands are content to put one poster up on a telephone poll, "We cover the entire pole – the entire street. Other bands have become very annoyed with us."

But Shlag says this is all part of what makes Zygote stand out above the rest. "It helps us get our name out there. It gives us a certain image and mystique.

"Zygote has existed for nine years and we're lucky we've been around that long. We've built up a real fan base. It's difficult out there, but we're still here. Many of the bands we started out with have dropped off. They haven't been able to keep it going."

Zygote plans on returning to the studio soon to record a follow-up to Turning Gyge's Ring. Shlag hopes this album will be more faithful to their live sound.

"The CD is of good quality but if you see us live you'd know that it doesn't capture the energy we have. The band has a much heavier feel than what came out on the CD. We thrive on stage."

To find out when Zygote's next gig is, check out their website.

Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir bring sounds of healing to Nuremberg

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Cantor Benjamin Maissner never wanted to go to Germany.

When he was 14 years old, a few years after the war ended, his father was going to Hannover where he had grown up, to arrange for reparations from the German government.

Young Ben was not pleased because so many members of his family had perished in the Holocaust.

Recently, some 50 years later, Maissner, who is the cantor at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple, and the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir stood in Meistersinger Halle in Nuremberg, performing a complex musical and emotional composition, Symphony #3, Kaddish by Leonard Bernstein.

Cantor Benjamin Maissner (left) is seen with the members of the Lachan Jewish Chamber Choir

The score for Kaddish, taken from the Jewish prayer for the dead, is a haunting reflection on belief, worship and humanity's relationship with God.

The Lachan Chamber Choir (lachan means melody in Hebrew), was formed in 1993 by the cantor and a group of experienced Toronto-based musicians who share a love of Jewish music. Maissner is the choir's music director.

The cantor and the 20 voices from Toronto joined 200 other voices from Los Angeles and Tel Aviv to bring The Sounds of Healing to citizens of Nuremberg, the site of the infamous Nazi rallies.

"What was so amazing was the fact that Meistersinger Halle was built upon the ruins of the Rally Grounds of the Third Reich," says Maissner. "It heightened the symphony's emotional, artistic and esthetic effect."

He says it is difficult to describe in words the "high emotions" felt during their trip to Nuremberg. The choir performed at two sold out community performances with an audience of over 3,000 and at a special concert for the Jewish community which has grown to over 1,000, many of whom are Russian Jews.

The Jewish community of Nuremberg dates back to the 12th century.

"There were endless ovations at all of our performances. My impression is that we had a profound impact upon the city. This radiated throughout our visit and it was expressed genuinely by all those we came in contact with," Maissner says.

The Jewish community held a Shabbat service and dinner for the visitors. The highlight of their trip was the concert presented for the Jewish community in Congress Hall, "the very same building built by Albert Speer, Hitler's chief architect. How magnificent the Hatikvah and Ani Ma'amin sounded in the echo chambers of that hall."

Maissner says their young German guide insisted that the visitors stand on the grounds of the Reichstag and on the terrace from which Hitler proclaimed his madness.

"It was the most difficult moment we encountered on our trip. Our guide then said, 'We, you and I are here, not them.' It was very moving."

The visitors met with the mayor of Nuremberg. "I had the privilege to sign the proclamation of Human Rights on behalf of the City of Toronto along with Rabbi Erwin Schild, rabbi emeritus, Adath Israel Congregation, and Rev. Karen Hamilton, a minister representing the United Church of Canada," Maissner says.

The Sounds of Healing was conceived some 15 years ago by a former chair of the Nuremberg Symphony, Gunter Einhouse and choirmaster Nick Strimple, a church organist and conductor of the Los Angeles Zimriyah Choral.

It was conceived as both a cross-cultural artistic collaboration and a mission of reconciliation between Germans and Jews, Christians and non-Christians.

To fund the Nuremberg mission, a committee was formed, spearheaded by Susan Cohen and Helena Fine. The Toronto chapter of Yad Vashem, an organization dedicated to Holocaust education, added its support to the Nuremberg project.

The support from all segments of the community was overwhelming, Maissner says. "So much goodwill and understanding happened between our choir members, as well as between the other participants."

St. Thomas shul is a jewel in the Caribbean

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

ST. THOMAS, U.S. Virgin Islands — Between irresistible deals on jewelry, watches, cameras and breathtaking crystal in this tax-free, duty-free, sun-soaked mecca, Jewish visitors can trek up a steep, crooked street overlooking the harbour, to the B'racha V'shalom V'gimilut Hasadim (Blessing and Peace and Loving Deeds) Synagogue, also known as the Hebrew Congregation of St. Thomas.

It's a charming little shul, a real jewel among the synagogues of the Caribbean. What makes it even more significant is that it is the oldest synagogue in continuous use under the American flag.

Located a stone's throw from the frenetic shopping district of the Virgin Islands' capital, Charlotte Amalie, on St. Thomas Island, the tiny shul draws a steady stream of tourists and is included in the town's walking tour. One young American couple recently wed there, while another renewed their marriage vows.

The first thing that strikes the visitor is the fine white sand strewn on the floor. Like many Caribbean synagogues, this one has kept the tradition of its Marrano roots. The Conversos who fled the Spanish Inquisition were forced to convert to Christianity but continued to practice Judaism in secret. Because that was punishable by death, they met in cellars and hideaways with sand covering the floors to muffle the sounds of their prayers.

Pundits both here and elsewhere in the Caribbean point to a member of Christopher Columbus' crew as the first Jewish presence in the region. Columbus discovered the Virgin Islands in 1493, with Luis de Torres serving as his translator. De Torres was dispatched to lead a scouting mission, and stayed as a regional governor.

A synagogue was founded by the Jews of St. Thomas in 1796, its nine Marrano-descended family members soon boosted to 22 with new arrivals from England, France and Dutch-owned Curacao. In 1804, the synagogue was destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt in 1812.

But by 1823, it had outgrown its walls and was replaced with a larger building on a road known as Synagogue Hill. The present structure was built in 1833, with Sabbath services held every week since, with one notable exception: Sept. 15, 1995, when Hurricane Marilyn devastated the island and damaged the shul.

For a short time in the late 19th century, politics shook the community. The synagogue proudly notes that the first confirmation ceremony in the Western hemisphere was performed there in 1843. Local Jews split over the issue, and for a while, there were two places of worship. In the end, the more liberal rabbi was fired and the two camps slowly learned to trust the other – except for 14 members who broke away and continued using the British Reform liturgy.

The synagogue, which is Reform, now numbers 70 family members, but with a donation anyone can become a "Chai Member." Rabbi Jay Heyman, a soft-spoken man who arrived seven months ago from Seattle, took the reins just as the synagogue finished a $600,000 restoration (with help from U.S. and world Jewry) that refastened the mahogany pews, buffed all the bronze and brass and whitened the ionic columns anew.

The small history exhibit in the rear of the building notes that the French-Jewish Impressionist painter Camille Pissarro spent a good part of his childhood on St. Thomas, as his work would later reflect.

Neither is the Danish influence accidental: the United States purchased the Virgin Islands from Denmark in 1917 for defence purposes.

Rabbi Heyman points out that the synagogue was built in the Sephardi style, with seats facing each other. As well, the Aron Kodesh faces the bimah on the opposite wall.

The rabbi notes that there is a cemetery chapel, Beth Ha'Haim, on the western outskirts of Charlotte Amalie. There is also a small Jewish community on neighbouring St. Croix (one of three inhabited islands comprising the U.S. Virgin Islands) that meets in a World War II-era Quonset hut dubbed B'nai Or Synagogue.

Business Profile

High tech incubator is entrepreneur's baby

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though South African-born entrepreneur Mark Skapinker works in the heart of the new economy, his business values are definitely old school.

As far as Skapinker is concerned, traditional business models have not been jettisoned just because an industry is high-tech or Internet-based. He's among those skeptics who never quite understood the phenomenal cachet of dot.coms and B2B (business to business) companies.

"The differences between the new and old economies will disappear and the new companies will be measured by standards of the old economy," he says.

Skapinker spoke well before the latest technology meltdown shook the stock market, but coming from someone who has profited from the world of computers and computer software, it was a cautionary piece of advice.

Skapinker is the CEO of Brightspark, a business incubator, which helps newborn companies develop and get strong enough to stand on their own.

The company operates two arms, Brightspark Labs and Brightspark Ventures, which together "incubate our ideas and those of entrepreneurs," Skapinker says.

Brightspark is a privately-held company in which Skapinker pools his talents with partners Tony Davis and Rick Nathan. Davis, inventor of WinFax software, is the technical specialist while Nathan, a corporate lawyer, is the company's deal maker and public voice on business issues.

Skapinker, 46, is in charge of the product.

For Brightspark's brain trust, responding to the numerous bright young entrepreneurs knocking on their doors could be a full time job in itself. One hundred applications a week land on their desks, but only about six of the very best have undergone the Brightspark treatment.

Good ideas are welcome, Skapinker says, but it takes more than a bright idea to earn Brightspark's vote of confidence.

"We want to see something tangible," he says."Our approach is, 'How can you create an enduring business with barriers to entry?' "

With a focus on companies that design software solutions to business problems, Skapinker believes "If there's software involved, we know how to create value."

Applicants must offer a substantive business plan with a reasonable prospect for profitability. Brightspark, after all, puts its money where its mouth is, taking an equity position in all its clients.

Once accepted, a company will receive up to $500,000 in the first six months, while Brightspark mentors help create a basic business infrastructure, provide human and legal resources, accounting services, office space, and help in devising an effective business strategy.

Brightspark Labs "helps entrepreneurs manage their expectations, think and plan appropriately," Skapinker says.

"We're infusing companies with the right experience without stifling their vision, core competency or enthusiasm."

When the company is ready to be launched, Brightspark Ventures, the company's capital fund with about $85 million on hand, steps in.

"We raise [the funds] from institutions, who invest with us and expect a return in five or six years. It's patient money. They're depending on our expertise," Skapinker says.

"We're unique in that other companies do this via the public marketplace [such as the Toronto Stock Exchange]."

Since Brightspark's launch in November 1999, it has "graduated" one company, Borderfree.com. Borderfree connects online shoppers to U.S. merchants, allowing Canadian customers access to American retailers without having to worry about shipping or currency exchange issues.

Several companies currently "in the lab," undergoing development, are:

- Careclinix and Chiroclinix, which focus on the non-traditional healthcare market, allowing professionals to communicate with customers;
- Infotriever Inc., which allows companies to update personal data systems such as Outlook and Palm handhelds with current personal information retrieved over the Internet; and
- Conversagent, a search tool that allows surfers to ask a series of questions online to narrow a search.

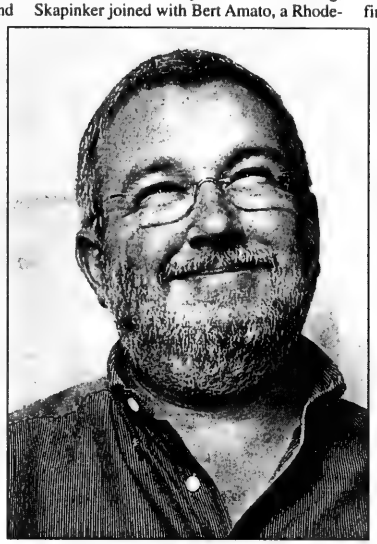
Skapinker, who grew up in Johannesburg, was introduced to the world of high-tech in Israel, where he lived for about six years in the late 1970s and early '80s. "I was entranced by the PC industry, which was just starting."

Trained in early programming languages like COBOL and BASIC, Skapinker learned "by diving in and working in the early stages."

His focus was on business applications, such as the insurance industry.

In 1982, he and his wife, Hazel Lanesman, moved to Toronto. His first job in Canada was with the Bank of Nova Scotia, "where I got a real chance to learn about the PC industry."

In 1987, bitten by the software bug, Skapinker joined with Bert Amato, a Rhodesian, and Dennis Bennie, another South African, to start their own company. "We decided we could compete with U.S. software companies and we invented Delrina."



Mark Skapinker

By 1995, Delrina had grown into one of Canada's largest software companies, employing 700 people worldwide and registering $150 million in business. Skapinker served as company president in charge of marketing and business development.

Davis, the company's vice-president of communication software strategy, became internationally known as the inventor of WinFax, a world leader in fax communication software. Software giant Symantec eventually acquired Delrina.

Davis went on to found Lancom and Delano Technology, but Skapinker took a break from the software industry and moved to Israel, where his mother and brothers resided.

Like was good in Kochav Yair, near Kfar Saba, but after two months Skapinker became restless and began seeking an outlet for his energies.

"I started working with Israeli venture capital firms to figure out how [they could] market themselves in North America... There is so much going on there, it's an exciting place to be."

Skapinker discovered a customer service software and formed Balisoft around it, moving the company to Canada in 1997. The product took off and in early 1999 he merged the company with ServiceSoft Technologies. The company was acquired in September by California-based Broadbase Software in a deal worth nearly $1 billion. Skapinker's 6.4 percent stake has been valued at about $61 million.

In the summer of 1999, Skapinker and Davis began discussing new business opportunities. They were particularly interested in the software industry, because "The margins are so high. Only perfume [companies] get similar margins."

Furthermore, Skapinker says, "We both liked early stages of software development. We decided to create Brightspark."

Brightspark's management, though outspoken in lobbying for changes to Canadian regulations and taxes to make local companies more competitive, has tried to create a working environment that will attract talent.

Of Brightspark's 70 employees, about 20 to 25 have been with Skapinker since the Delrina days. A "very aggressive option plan," freedom to work from home and high corporate standards make the company a desirable place to work, he says.

While the company's focus reaches far beyond Canada's borders, "We treat North America as a single marketplace – a lot of our products capitalize on the advantages of being in Canada. We have a talent pool that's far more loyal and cost effective than those in Silicon Valley."

In addition to his business interests, Skapinker is actively involved in UJA and Israel Bonds and is chairman of the board at Bialik Hebrew Day School, where two of his children study. A third is enrolled at CHAT.

330 OBITUARIES

ALLEN, Misha - passed away suddenly on Thurs., Jan. 18, 2001. Beloved husband of Hilda, father of Neil and Marsha and her husband Michael, and brother of Abraham Katzenelenbogen of Montreal. In compliance with his written instructions, there were no funeral services, and the body was donated to the Department of Anatomy and Cell Biology at the University of Toronto for medical research. Misha was a loving and generous man who made a difference in the lives of a great many people, and all who knew him are deeply saddened at this loss. As an expression of sympathy, donations may be made to the Ontario Heart and Stroke Foundation.

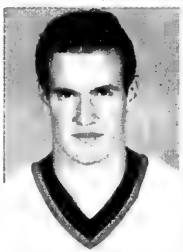
Henrich paying his dues in AHL

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Got to pay your dues if you want to sing the blues..."

Catchy, yes; true, undoubtedly.

Excellence doesn't come easy, whether it's in pop music or in the world of sports, as aspiring NHLer Michael Henrich is fast finding out.



Michael Henrich

It's one thing to enjoy a great junior career or even to hear your name called out in the first round of the NHL entry draft; it's another to turn that into a successful career in the NHL.

Henrich, a former standout with the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) Barrie Colts, is finding the sledding tough as a rookie with the Hamilton Bulldogs of the American Hockey League (AHL). A goal-scorer and go-to guy throughout his junior career, Henrich started the season slowly, pulling third and fourth line duties for the Bulldogs, feeling his way around the league and paying his dues, if not exactly singing the blues.

The first half of his first pro season was tough, and a move to the Edmonton Oilers, the Bulldogs' parent team, was not on the immediate horizon. But in recent weeks his hard work has paid off and he's been rewarded with a move to the team's second line, where his goal-scoring abilities will get the best chance to shine.

For a 20-year-old, fresh out of junior, life in the minors is nothing out of the ordinary. It's just part of a normal development process for a talented skater who was ranked by NHL Central Scouting as the fifth best North American prospect in 1998.

Henrich, a six-foot two, 206-lb. right winger with a knack for scoring goals, was selected in the first round, 13th overall, in the 1998 amateur draft. His Jewish background was widely publicized at the time and it's likely no other Jewish skater has ever been drafted higher.

He attended two Oiler training camps before returning to finish junior and a third before the start of the current season. The camps and Henrich's natural development process made their mark as his game in junior improved from year to year.

In 66 games with the Colts last season, Henrich scored 38 times and added 48 assists for 86 points. With his size, strength, speed and skills, he found himself a step ahead of the competition and things came pretty easily to him. He helped lead the Colts to the OHL championship and a birth in the Memorial Cup. The Colts advanced to the final before losing to the Quebec League's Rimouskie Oceanique.

Following training camp with the Oilers this summer, he was assigned to Hamilton, where he made the lineup and has been a regular for each of the team's first 41 games.

Half way through the season, Henrich admits he's still getting his feet wet and trying to find a comfort zone. For a hotshot player, the experience can be humbling.

"It's not easy, that's for sure," Henrich said. Compared to junior, "the hockey is a lot better, the players are a lot better, they're older and more experienced.

"I'm back to the mind frame of my first year in junior. You're not the go-to guy, you have to chip in when you can."

Early in the season, Henrich was given something more than spot duty, but less than a regular shift. He was on the ice for four shifts in the first period but only a couple in the second and third periods. In a blowout, he was liable to get more ice time.

For a skater who's historically been able to put the puck in the net, the irregular work was frustrating.

"I know I can put points on the board," he said. "It's just a matter of getting a lot of ice time, getting confidence and putting the puck in the net."

Bulldogs coach Claude Julien believes Henrich has what it takes to eventually move up to the Oilers.

"In Michael's case there's no doubt there are a lot of skills. He's a good prospect for us. He's off to a slow start but lately he's been progressing and making strides every day."

The coaches are being patient with Henrich, making him "more aware" of the defensive side of the game and more conscious about finishing his checks, Julien said.

"When he goes back to being a goal scorer, he'll have those skills," the coach explained.

In the first 41 games this season, Henrich scored three goals and added five assists on 63 shots..

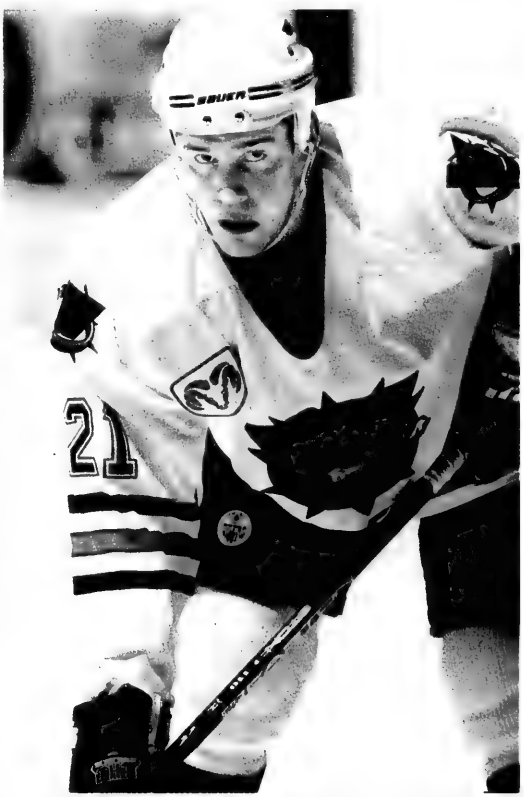
"They want me to score and they're asking me to go in the corners, bump and grind and do the things that go into the game of hockey."

The move to the second line is a vote of confidence in Henrich, Julien said, adding that in recent games, "Michael has been starting to create [goal-scoring] chances."

Henrich feels it's important to develop his all-round game in the AHL, work hard in all three zones and mind his defensive responsibilities. His minus three is respectable on a team where six players are minus 12 or worse.

"I'm working hard on things I haven't done before," he said.

Perhaps in a year or two, his hard work will pay off and he'll be singing the sweet song of success as a regular in the Oilers lineup.



Improved play has landed Henrich a spot on the second line.

Marty Glickman, foiled Olympian, dies at 83

CJN news services

NEW YORK — Marty Glickman, a track star who believed he was denied a chance to run in the 1936 Berlin Olympics because he was Jewish, died recently. He was 83.

He died of complications from heart surgery, according to one of his daughters, Elizabeth Alderman.

Glickman claimed the coach in charge of the 400-metre relay team, who dropped him and Sam Stoller, another Jew, from the team the day before the race, was a Nazi sympathizer.

Glickman made similar charges against Avery Brundage, then head of the United States Olympic Committee (USOC).

The charges were not proved, but in 1998, the president of the USOC said he believed Glickman's allegations were correct.

That year, the committee presented Glickman with a plaque in lieu of the gold medal he would have earned as a member of the victorious relay team.

The 1936 Olympics are notorious because they were staged by Hitler to demonstrate the superiority of Aryan culture. Ironically, the star of the Games was Jesse Owens – a Black American who won his fourth gold medal as one of the replacements for Glickman and Stoller.

The son of a textile salesman and a homemaker, Glickman was born in the Bronx and raised in Brooklyn.

Following the Olympics, Glickman became well known as a sports announcer for New York professional sports teams. He was a radio announcer for the New York Knicks basketball team when they were formed in 1946, and later called games for both the New York Giants and New York Jets football teams.

Glickman is survived by his wife, two sons and two daughters.

מהפכת התפוזים של מתי
מאת: תמי שם טוב, הוצאת הקיבוץ המאוחד.

"מהפכת התפוזים של מתי" הוא סיפורה של מתי קטלוני מתל אביב. זהו ללא ספק גם סיפורם של ילדים רבים, באשר הם, שסובלים מליקויי למידה. לחוצים ובודדים במאבקם, לא אחת הילדים הללו מפתחים מנגנוני הסוואה מורכבים ולו רק שלא לחשוף את שונותם.

מתי קטלוני היא ילדה מקסימה, בת לחורים תומכים ונכדה לסבתא מאוד אוהבת. גם חברותיה אוהדות אותה ועל אף כל הניבוי הזה, מתי עושה הכל ולו רק לא לגלות את סודה האיום: שהיא תלמידה בכיתה ג' ועדיין האותיות, הן בקריאה והן בכתיבה זרות לה. (הסיפור מסופר על-ידי ילדה צעירה ולכן אין כאן נתוח פסיכולוגי-חינוכי וטוב כך.)

המורה החדשה בכיתה ג', שאיננה אהובה על מתי, מדווחת להורים שאם לא יחול שינוי מהיר בהשגיה של מתי לא יהיה מנוס אלא להוריד את מתי לכיתה ב'. ההורים מפצירים במתי: "תשתדלי, את ילדה נבונה, זה ברור, אבל את צריכה להשקיע ולהתאמץ." האפשרות שיהיה על מתי לרדת לכיתה ב' כמובן מעוררת בה חלחלה איומה אך נראה ששום התקדמות לא חלה עד... עד למהפכת התפוזים!

הרעיון נולד בזכות סבתא של מתי. יום אחד, כשסבתא ומתי אוכלות שניצלים עם פירה, סבתא מגלה לנכדתה סוד: "יהעינים שלי הולכות ונחלשות... אפילו את העתון אני כבר לא מצליחה לקרוא ואני נורא מתביישת בזה, אין לי אומץ לספר."

בשלב זה נכנס לתמונה הדוד יואל, צלם במקצועו. יהיה זה יואל שיגלה את סודן של סבתא ומתי; סבתא לא יכולה לקרוא ומתי לא יודעת. במהלך השעות שיואל מבלה בשיחות עם מתי הוא מספר לה על חומר בקליפת התפוז שבוער באש. מתי נרגשת; היא תציע לראש הממשלה שיתחילו לחקור את האפשרות להשתמש בקליפות תפוזים כתחליף לדלק ובכך תפתר, לפחות חלקית, בעית זיהום האוויר וסבתא תהיה מאושרת.

שוב, ללא הסבר פדגוגי, אנו מבינים שהתמריץ הנכון (לעזור לסבתא) בשלוב עם ההפעלה המתאימה (מחשב נשא שיואל קנה למתי) הם שפתחו את פתח הישועה לילדה. הפעם מאמציה העילאיים של מתי לרכוש את מיומנויות הקריאה והכתיבה החלו לעלות יפה.

ומהפכת התפוזים? ראש הממשלה אכן שיגר למתי מענה למכתבה והוא הבטיח ("ברגע שיחזור מירדן") לבדוק את אפשרות השימוש בקליפות תפוזים לצורך תדלוק מנועים. כך, מסבירה מתי, החלה מהפכת התפוזים.

FOR LESS

1 large onion	1/4 cup apricot jam	1 cup dried apricots
1 tblsp oil	1 cup orange juice	1 cup roasted, unsalted almonds
1 chicken, quartered, skinned & boned	juice of 1 lemon	(1/2 cup chopped coarsely,
1/4 tsp ginger	2 cups chicken broth	1/2 cup whole)
1/2 tsp cinnamon	1 cup prunes, pitted	salt & pepper to taste

Chop onion. Saute in large pot with oil until soft. Sprinkle chicken with ginger & cinnamon. Place chicken in the pot, and brown on all sides. Add all other ingredients, but reserve the 1/2 cup whole almonds for a garnish.

Cook over low heat for at least 40 minutes, keeping an eye open to make sure there is enough liquid. Add more broth if necessary. Add salt and pepper to taste.

Serve with rice and garnish with remaining almonds.

GRANDMA JENNIE'S BASIC BURGERS

¼ cup breadcrumbs
1 large egg or 2 egg whites (or ¼ cup egg substitute)
½ cup grated or finely chopped onion
3 tbsp. ketchup
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. pressed garlic
1 lb. ground meat or vegetarian meat substitute
Canola oil cooking spray
4 hamburger buns

Preheat grill to highest setting. In a large mixing bowl, combine breadcrumbs, egg, onion, ketchup, mustard and garlic. Using your hands, gently fold meat into wet mixture; mix until combined. Divide into 4 equal portions. Wet hands and shape burgers about 4 to 5 inches in diameter and no thicker than ¾ inch. Refrigerate covered until ready to grill; this helps burgers set so they hold together better on the grill. Wash hands thoroughly.

Spray each burger lightly on both sides with cooking spray. Place on preheated grill and cook until done (see below).

To serve: On each plate, place a lettuce leaf, then top it with a burger, slice of tomato and slice of onion. Place a bun on each plate, garnish with a pickle and serve.

Two-Sided Contact Grill: 6 to 7 minutes. Place burgers on preheated grill and put upper grill plate down on top of it. Do not lift the upper grill plate or disturb the food until time is up or you will not get distinct grill marks. If burger has not reached 160 F internal temperature after initial timing period, continue grilling for additional 1 to 2 minute intervals until done.

Note: Double the cooking time if you are using a hibachi, combination grill or infusion grill. Turn burgers at half time.

Crisis on campuses: students respond

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students from across Canada will be creating a national advocacy structure to deal with the unprecedented level of anti-Israel – and some think anti-Jewish – sentiment rampant on campuses since the intifadah began last fall.

The decision came during a special three-day brainstorming session held at Camp B'nai Brith in the Laurentians the weekend of Jan. 19-21, said Hillel Jewish Student Centre director Simon Bensimon.

New advocacy structure to fight anti-Israel rhetoric

(Please see additional story on page 22)

Called Israel Activism Retreat: The Crisis on Campus, the weekend drew about 65 students, mostly from Quebec, but also including 15 from Ontario.

The event was chiefly funded by UIA Federations Canada and co-sponsored locally by Hillel Jewish Student Centre, the Quebec regions of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada, the Canada-Israel Committee and FEDERATION CJA.

The latter four organizations are members of a special "crisis" committee formed locally to address the latest violence in the Middle East.

"There was a feeling of a need to get organized," Bensimon said. "This weekend was successful not only in terms of numbers, but [also in terms of] what was done."

"The spirit of co-operation was definitely there," echoed Eta Yudin of CJC-Q's communications department. "I think the students got that extra bit of confidence they needed."

The News in Brief

CANADA

STAR Grant

TORONTO — Beth Tzedec Congregation, in partnership with UJA FEDERATION of Greater Toronto, the Board of Jewish Education and United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, has been awarded a $21,000 STAR grant. The money will allow the synagogue to implement a program in which volunteer members will be recruited, trained and deployed to serve as personal mentors/coaches for those seeking to develop themselves Jewishly. The Chicago-based STAR (Synagogue Transformation and Renewal) recently announced $1.1 million in grants to synagogues in the United States and Canada.

ISRAEL

Protocols Cited

JERUSALEM — The official newspaper of the Palestinian Authority cited the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, the notorious anti-Semitic forgery, as "proof" that Israel is trying to control the international media. A Jan. 25 article in the daily Al-Hayat Al-Jadidah also said, "Moral and psychological manipulation has a significant place in the minds of Jews."

Kahane Arrests

JERUSALEM — Israeli security officials arrested six members of a terrorist cell they said was responsible for killing several Israelis, including far-right leader Benjamin Ze'ev Kahane and his wife Talia, in December. According to the officials, the six belonged to Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Force 17 security service. Seven more members of the cell are still at large in Palestinian areas.

Grandmother Dies

JERUSALEM — The grandmother of an Israeli teenager lured to his murder in Ramallah by a woman he met on the Internet died on the day the family ended the shivah period for the youth. The Israeli daily Ma'ariv reported that Ophir Rahum's grandmother collapsed upon learning of her grandson's murder and died several hours after the traditional shivah for Rahum ended. She was buried near her grandson.

WORLD

Intolerance Parley

STOCKHOLM — Several Canadians attended last week's international gathering here aimed at combating racism. The Canadian delegation to the Stockholm International Forum on Combating Intolerance was headed by Montreal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and included Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights; Adrian Norfolk of the Department of Foreign Affairs; and Alison LeClaire Christie, a counsellor at the Canadian Embassy in Stockholm. The conference focused on the spread of far-right hate propaganda via rock music and the Internet.

'Rewriting History'

BUDAPEST — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is calling on the Hungarian government to reject a demand by the far-right "Justice and Life" party that it reconsider the war crimes conviction of former prime minister Laszlo Bardossy. The wartime leader shared responsibility for the 1941 massacre of 18,000 Hungarian Jews, said Efraim Zuroff, director of the Wiesenthal Centre's Israel office. Zuroff urged the Hungarian government to reject "this outrageous demand by right-wing extremists who seek to rewrite Hungarian history."

Uniform Flap

LONDON — A Jewish stockbroker whose grandparents were murdered at Auschwitz is suing his former employer for telling him to wear a Nazi uniform as punishment for coming to work late. Laurent Weinberger is also alleging he was called anti-Semitic names. The company denies any wrongdoing, saying it is common practice for traders who arrive late to be given a costume to wear.

Jew Rejected

SANA'A, Yemen — Officials here have rejected the candidacy of a Jewish man who wanted to run in the nation's Feb. 20 municipal elections. Yemen's election committee rejected Ibrahim Ezer's application "because he is a Jew, and municipal law stipulates that election candidates should be Muslims," a committee official told a French news agency. Had his candidacy been upheld, he would have been the first Jew to run for political office in Yemen. Some 600 Jews still live in Yemen.

Attacks on British Jews Soared in 2000

LONDON — Attacks on British Jews increased 50 percent in 2000, according to a report issued last week.

The Community Security Trust, which monitors anti-Semitic incidents in Britain, recorded 405 such incidents against the community in 2000, up from 270 in 1999.

A group spokesperson said the ongoing violence between Israel and the Palestinians had spilled over into the United Kingdom.

Spokesperson Michael Whine said 147 anti-Semitic incidents, 36 percent of the year's total, occurred in October and November. The October figure of 105 incidents represent a 400 percent increase over October 1999.

Whine also said the figures should be seen in the context of an increase in racist activity across Britain.

Nearly half the incidents in 2000 were "acts of abusive behaviour," but the statistics also include two life-threatening attacks on British Jews.

Sharansky joins in rally for Jerusalem

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbis from three streams of Judaism joined last week with keynote speaker Natan Sharansky to outline the central – and non-negotiable – place of Jerusalem in the hearts and minds of the Jewish people.

Jerusalem supersedes mundane political calculations and is the anchor that has united and kept the Jewish people for 3,000 years, they said.

The speakers' remarks came during a community solidarity rally for the unity of Jerusalem held last week at the Shaarei Shomayim synagogue. As many as 2,500 people jammed into the sanctuary and spilled over into the upper balcony to attend the hastily convened rally. Several hundred watched the proceedings on a video screen in the shul's Brotherhood Hall. The audience represented a cross-section of Jews from across the political and cultural spectrum.

Quoting psalms, prophets and the Talmud, the rabbis – Baruch Frydman-Kohl of the Beth Tzedec Congregation, John Moscowitz of the Holy Blossom Temple and Moshe Shulman of Shaarei Shomayim – agreed on the Jewish people's ancient historical and spiritual links to Jerusalem.

Sharansky, a member of the Knesset and leader of the Yisrael B'Aliyah party, joked that the rabbis had stolen his thunder with their remarks about the holy city. However, the former Soviet political prisoner held the audience in rapt attention with his description of Jerusalem's role in his life and how it gave him strength through years as a prisoner in the Soviet gulag.

Natan Sharansky [File photo]

A second generation assimilated Jew with little knowledge of Judaism, Sharansky's only link to the Jewish people was a notation in his identity card, which served to restrict access by Jews to better careers and social advancement.

The 1967 Six Day War – and the capture of East Jerusalem by Israeli forces – changed his life, he said. "There came the day that despite all the [radio] jamming by the KGB, we heard the voice of [Israeli general] Mota Gur, 'The Temple Mount is in our hands.'"

At the time, he did not even know what the Temple Mount was, but he noticed that the attitude of his anti-Semitic neighbours had changed. "They may have treated us with the same hatred, but with more respect," he said.

Israel's success strengthened him while awakening an interest in his Jewish heritage. Instead of running away from the Jewish people and Judaism, "Jerusalem gave [the Jewish people] the strength to fight," he said.

Sharansky recalled that at his trial for treason, orchestrated by the KGB and with the result a foregone conclusion, he concluded his remarks to the court, in Hebrew, with the phrase, "Next year in Jerusalem."

Those words have established a connection between generations of Jews and "ensured that the Jewish people will fight for you... That's what makes us all one people."

Sharansky said that as a political prisoner whose hopes were kept alive by thoughts of Jerusalem, he could never have foreseen he would write an open letter to the Prime Minister of Israel raising his concern that the government was considering giving it away as part of a deal with the Palestinians.

"It means our people will lose their identity... the connections between the Jewish people would be weakened," Sharansky said.

He urged Prime Minister Ehud Barak not to cross the "red line" of Jerusalem. "We Jewish people can never give away our own heart, Jerusalem."

Negotiations over Jerusalem demonstrated the Israeli government had lost track of the importance of the holy city. It transcends issues of peace and security. "It's about identity," he said.

From the editor's desk

This month, I draw readers' attention to two books: one about Jews who lived in England, the other by a Jew who lives there now.

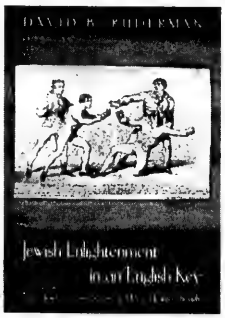
Jewish Enlightenment in an English Key, by David B. Ruderman (Princeton University Press), opens the reader's eyes. That it does is a measure of the work's success, for that is precisely what the author intended.

"This book," Ruderman writes in the introduction, "seeks to reclaim a place for a small group of Jewish intellectuals in England who have been generally neglected in the study of both modern Jewish history and in the history of Anglo-Jewry. It argues for the uniqueness of the English political and social climate in shaping a particular Jewish cultural response to modernity, one, in many ways, unlike those emerging in Germany or in eastern Europe."

Ruderman brings alongside the ocean-liner of the German-Jewish Haskalah, or Enlightenment, the battling barge of English-Jewish Haskalah.

An active, confident, creative, even argumentative Jewish intelligentsia in England strove – with their own community and with the majority Christian host culture – to reconcile Judaism with modernity even as their kinfolk in central and eastern continental Europe were doing so as well.

The intellectual, political and cultural conditions of English life, Ruderman poignantly asserts, were especially hospitable and conducive to the creativity of the Jewish thinkers.



The English island, governed by the traditions and canons of parliamentary monarchical rule and with an official religious faith that a century earlier had rejected and rebelled against the conformist dictates of the Church in Rome, was fertile ground for scientific and philosophical adventuring and pioneering in a way that continental Europe was not.

Among the bold Anglo-Jewish adventurers whom Ruderman introduces, to most of us for the first time, are names such as David Levi, Abraham Tang, Mordechai Shnaber Levison, Samuel Falk, Isaac Delgado and Emanual Mendes da Costa, to name but a few.

Ruderman, the Joseph Meyerhoff Professor of Modern Jewish History and Director of the Center for Advanced Judaic Studies at the University of Pennsylvania, has performed an important service. In opening our eyes to a wider horizon of Jewish scholarship, he has at the same time opened the doors for further investigation into the intellectually rich transition among European Jewry toward "modern" times.

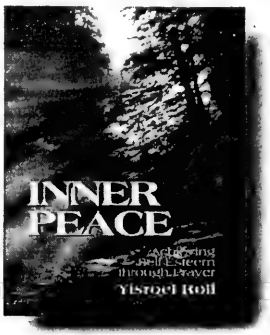
Inner Peace, Achieving Self-Esteem Through Prayer (Targum/Feldheim publishers), is the work of Yisroel Roll. It's chief characteristic is affection, respect and concern for the reader.

In a thoughtful, gently-written text, Rabbi Roll guides the reader in finding for himself or herself, the treasures that can help them better cope with the rigours and stresses of daily life, treasures that lie undiscovered for many: the specific structure and substance of our daily prayers.

Indeed, the very nature and purpose of prayer are explored, explained and elaborated upon in his illuminating text. Rabbi Roll neither hectors nor preaches; he teaches by bringing new insights and by sharing personal experiences.

It is testament to the importance and to the worthiness of the book that Rabbi Dr. Abraham Twerski, one of the world's foremost scholars and practitioners devoted to the welfare and well-being of the human psyche, has written its foreword.

A native of Montreal, Rabbi Roll is also a lawyer. He was raised in a home where commitment to community was considered a high obligation, and was passed on to him to cherish as a privilege as much as a duty.



He has lived in England for a decade combining demanding pulpit responsibilities with significant pastoral endeavors as well. Rabbi Roll founded Encounter, an organization devoted to kiruv (outreach) initiatives, and is currently the Rav and Director of the SEED Community Centre in Edgware, England.

Inner Peace, Achieving Self-Esteem Through Prayer is delightful and inspiring.

Clinics to aid survivors in filing for compensation

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Several Jewish communal organizations have come together to host regular clinics that will help Holocaust survivors complete application forms for compensation for war-era slave and forced labour.

The sessions will be staffed by trained volunteers who will help former slaves complete necessary paperwork.

A dozen volunteers gathered last week at the Lipa Green Building to hear how the clinics will be run and to go over the forms.

The joint effort is a first in Toronto and part of a worldwide campaign to find and compensate as many former slaves as possible.

In the coming weeks, the New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, known as the Claims Conference, will co-ordinate efforts in 40 countries and eight languages.

It will conduct a publicity blitz, taking out ads in nearly 160 Jewish newspapers, including The CJN, explaining the mechanics of compensation and where survivors can go for help.

In Toronto, a room will be set aside in the Lipa Green Building. The clinics will run from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, beginning March 5. Each session will be staffed by four volunteers. Times must be scheduled in advance.

Survivors will be urged to bring with them as much information and supporting documents about their war-time experiences as they can.

Last year, the German government and German industries announced a $7.9 billion (Cdn) fund to compensate over one-million war-time slave and forced labourers. Forced labourers were mainly non-Jewish civilians who were seconded to work on farms and infrastructure. Slaves were Jews who were often worked to death in Nazi factories, concentration camps and ghettos.

Between 7,000 and 8,000 survivors in Toronto are believed eligible for compensation for slave labour. They or their heirs are entitled to roughly $10,000 each, half paid upon approval and half later.

Anyone who was alive on Feb. 15, 1999 is eligible for compensation. After that date, direct heirs are eligible.

The clinics are mainly intended to help one-time slaves fill out a six-page application, known as the long form. Only those survivors who have never received any compensation from Germany, or have been refused, will be required to fill out the long form.

Those who have received compensation, whether monthly payments known as Wiedergutmachung, or payments either through the so-called Hardship Fund or the Article 2 Fund, will be required to fill out a much simpler two-page form.

The shorter forms have already been mailed out to thousand of survivors. Last fall, recipients of monthly pensions and Hardship Fund payments received the short forms; in January, the short forms were mailed to those who have received compensation under the Article 2 Fund.

The clinics, as well as many synagogues and communal buildings, will stock the long forms, last week's training session was told.

The clinics will allot about an hour to help fill out the long forms and half that for the short ones.

They will also notarize all applications. Volunteers, some of whom are survivors themselves, will be versed in several languages and trained in the sensitivities of dealing with the emotional aspect of compensation.

Often, the volunteers heard, survivors are either confused by forms or put off by them.

The joint communal effort brings together several groups: the United Restitution Organization (URO), which has handled claims for years; Jewish Information Service; United Israel Appeal Federations Canada; and Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada.

Perry Romberg of United Israel Appeal explained to the volunteers that the criteria for slave labour compensation are broad. All survivors of concentration camps and ghettos are encouraged to fill out a form.

Only those who fled to the Soviet Union probably won't qualify, Romberg noted.

Applicants will not have to pay a fee. The deadline for submitting forms is Aug. 11, 2001. Forms may be downloaded at www.claimscon.org. However, they may not be submitted by e-mail.

Completed documents will forwarded to the Claims Conference.

Meantime, the community has set up a telephone hotline, which is scheduled to become fully operational once the publicity campaign gets off the ground. The number is 416-631-5825.

Lieberman's life returns to normal following U.S. election

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Hadassah Lieberman's mother Ella Freilich, a survivor of Auschwitz and Dachau, wasn't the only one who was "very excited" when her son-in-law became U.S. Vice President Al Gore's running mate.

It was "an amazing moment historically for the entire Jewish community," said the wife of Senator Joseph Lieberman in a phone interview last week from Washington, D.C.

For survivors who once thought they might not live to see the next day, let alone go on to marry and raise families, there was a particular poignancy at seeing one of their own children on the national stage, she added.

Not only was the senator the first Jewish person on a national ticket in the United States, as his wife pointed out, but the Liebermans' observant lifestyle garnered much media attention.

Hadassah Lieberman

Hadassah Lieberman spoke to all immigrants early in the campaign when she said, "Here I am, the daughter of survivors. Whether you or your family immigrated from Europe, Africa, Latin America or Asia, I am standing here for you."

Lieberman will be in Toronto Feb. 21 to speak at the Toronto Centre for the Arts for UJA FEDERATION's campaign closing. She has been asked to discuss her background, her campaign experiences and her involvement in Jewish causes.

Hadassah Freilich was born in Prague after the war, and grew up in Gardner, Mass., where her late father, Rabbi Samuel Freilich, was the community rabbi. She has a Master's degree in American Government and International Affairs, and worked as an analyst-researcher at the investment firm Lehman Brothers as well as at the National Research Council as a health care expert.

Recently, she's been working on a chapter for a book about daughters of survivors, being compiled by an artist friend.

As a committed Jew, Lieberman said, she has been involved with the federation, mostly in New Haven, Conn.

She wants the Jewish community to know how important it is to come together in unity. "Some of the divisiveness that exists is unfortunate," she said. "I hope that we can work together to improve the places we live in."

Among Lieberman's other community involvements, she is a board member of the Jewish student group Lights in Action, and has been involved in an advisory capacity with Shaare Zedek Hospital.

Since the election and its delayed outcome, life has returned to "more normal" for the Lieberman family. "I'm just leading a normal life, give or take some things that are realities to my lifestyle.

"I'm juggling with all kinds of things I am responsible for, whether kids, parents, husband, friends, community or carpooling," she said. "My life keeps me grounded."

Traditional observance also plays a role, Lieberman noted. "We know Friday night is always Shabbat, so nothing that happens during the week is too important, or not important enough, that it changes the reality of what happens at the end of the week."

Lieberman does not believe there is a conflict between Jewish observance and a life in politics. "Maybe a difficulty now and then," she admitted.

Why I'm in Israel now.

Photographed at Masada, on January 28, 2001

"This isn't my first time in Israel. But it's by far the most meaningful.

"My friends back home asked, 'Why Israel, there are so many other places to go?'

"But I'm so glad I came! The evening news back home isn't showing the Israel I'm seeing.

"I have my hiking shoes on and I'm rediscovering Masada. Then I'm off to a spa at the Dead Sea.

"The Chagall windows look more beautiful than ever.

"And yesterday, I visited the Western Wall and left a very special prayer.

"In Tel Aviv, I plan to go to the Philharmonic, visit the museums and enjoy the beach.

"I've never felt so alive as I do now. And I'm gathering memories that will last a lifetime."

Jews urged to keep lobbying for school funding

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ontario's Jewish community should take advantage of Premier Mike Harris's planned public consultation process to press the case for funding of Jewish day schools, says MPP David Young.

If that case is pressed hard enough – and presented as a matter of choice – the funding of private, faith-based schools could become a plank in the next Tory platform, one that would be fulfilled, Young told last week's executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

While Young, the lone Jewish MPP in the government, didn't come out and say it directly, his comments seemed to mirror recent statements by his colleague, Thornhill MPP Tina Molinari, who said public funding of private schools won't happen during the remainder of Premier Mike Harris's current term [CJN, Feb. 1.]

In a closed meeting with advocates last month, Molinari said the Jewish community should use that time to mount a case for funding – as did Young last week.

Two weeks ago, Harris announced he will seek a third term, and took the wraps off plans to craft his party's next platform. Dubbed Seizing Tomorrow's Opportunities, the plan will involve province-wide, large-scale public consultations beginning in April and culminating in a fall policy convention. Young called it "the largest consultation in Canadian political history," and an exercise in "visioning."

David Young

"We're asking Ontarians to join us in creating a shared vision," he said. "We want to open up the decision-making process."

But even before Young spoke, CJC Ontario region chair Keith Landy rebuked the MPP, referring to Molinari's earlier comments.

"The Jewish people are a patient people," Landy said. "But our patience is wearing thin." He called on Young to "let the premier and the caucus know the waiting game is at an end."

Young, the member for Willowdale, conceded that the funding issue "may not be a vehicle that is travelling as fast as we would like." And he stressed that rather than refer to school funding, he would emphasize "school choice, because frankly, I think it is a better word, a word that will give us a greater opportunity to achieve a level of success.

"You and I both know there is nothing wrong with allowing choice in education."

Molinari said the same thing last month, arguing that faith communities should abandon claims of discrimination and present their case as a matter of choice.

While Young acknowledged the community's frustration, he said the premier's consultations will be "the best opportunity" the community has to discuss funding. "What comes from this process is going to form the basis of our next platform. And our party has a track record of delivering on the promises we make."

Young used the opportunity to tout Harris's achievements, including the allocation in the last budget of $11 million for limited health services in independent schools, including nursing, physiotherapy and speech pathology.

"I know these are small steps but I think they are important steps." And, he added, the government is willing to consider further steps, such as funds for textbooks, transport costs and computer software.

But not everyone in the room was buying Young's message.

David Rotenberg, who served as a Conservative MPP for eight years under two premiers, said Young's message was "totally unacceptable.

"This is the time to do it," Rotenberg said. "If we're going to seize tomorrow, tomorrow is here."

Robert Samry, president of Jewish Parents for Equality in Education Funding (JPEEF), noted that funding independent and faith-based schools would cost roughly $250 million, less than two percent of Ontario's $13.5 billion education budget.

Others wondered aloud just how much more noise the Jewish community has to make for the government to take notice.

Asked directly whether he personally supports fair funding, Young said, "Yes. And I'm not alone in the caucus. A lot of members have strong feelings."

But ultimately, funding will be "a political decision. Until the political will is there, it will be difficult."

In other communal news, Congress announced that after months of often difficult negotiations, it has persuaded Rogers Cable to run a disclaimer before and after a locally produced television show featuring messianic Jews.

The show, which runs on Rogers Sunday nights, features members of Melech Yisrael, a Jews for Jesus type messianic "synagogue" in Toronto.

The full-screen disclaimer, which will also be read, is as follows:

"The producers of this program consider themselves Jewish but embrace Jesus as their messiah. The Jewish community and its partner, Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto, regard such persons as having forsaken Judaism and oppose their methods."

50 STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS CANADA

February, 2001

An Open Letter to Our Community:

Israel Bonds has concluded another successful year, thanks to the commitment and support of thousands of our steadfast investors. You are all shareholders in Israel's future, and we thank each and every one of you.

This year, with such difficulties in our beloved homeland, however, Israel needs our investment dollars more than ever. Accordingly, I would like to reiterate and clarify our position in Canada's Jewish community.

Israel Bonds' sole purpose is to strengthen the nation's economy. In so doing, Bonds affect the lives of every Israeli, in positive and beneficial ways, every day.

As Israel's Minister of Finance recently stated, "I think it's safe to say that there is no place and no major project in Israel in which Israel Bonds has not played a part." These projects have included construction of the National Water Carrier in 1955, the Darom Power Station in 1985, which supplies over 50% of the nation's energy needs, and the Tel-Aviv – Jerusalem Highway. In 2001, Israel Bonds money is being used for one of the most important endeavours in history: *advanced desalination and water protection projects.

Israel Bonds are a key part of the nation's capital raising plans, accounting for a major percentage of Israel's infrastructure budget. With infrastructure needs expected to triple over the next 12 years – especially due to the continuing private sector boom – Bonds quotas will be gradually increased to meet this economic challenge.

Unlike loans from banks or other such entities, Bonds dollars are from dedicated, loyal sources, and ensure that Israel's destiny, both economic and otherwise, will be autonomous, independent and with the nation's best interests at heart. In good times as well as bad, this economic strength and security are of paramount importance.

Israel, like any country, will always have its share of controversies and difficulties. Israel Bonds benefits all of Israel, and is strictly apolitical.

We firmly believe that the independence and strength of modern Israel in our lifetime is a precious, fragile miracle that must be sustained.

We look forward to working with our community in maintaining this much-needed capital for the State of Israel.

Yours very sincerely,

George A. Cohon
Chairman of the Board

When terror struck in the sky and 270 died

Last week, three Scottish judges holding court in the Netherlands, found Abdelbaset Ali Mohmed al-Megrahi guilty of murder in the bombing of Pan Am Flight 103 on Dec. 21, 1988. The airplane was en route to New York from London. A bomb had been planted in a cassette recorder inside a suitcase in the cargo hold of the airplane. The ensuing explosion sent the airplane crashing into the cold ground from the high sky above Lockerbie, Scotland; 270 people lost their lives.

Reading from an 82-page decision, the judges said: "There was nothing in the evidence which leaves us with any reasonable doubt as to the guilt" of Megrahi. Megrahi was sentenced to life imprisonment with the possibility of parole only after 20 years. His co-accused, Al Amin Khalifa, was discharged, the prosecution having failed to establish the circumstantial case against him beyond a reasonable doubt.

To the extent that justice can ever bring a measure of imperfect consolation to the grieving families and friends of murdered innocents, the outcome of the Lockerbie trial cannot bring even that. For whatever meagre consolation flowed from the verdict and sentencing, it was flawed because the justice itself was flawed.

The accused were not handed over to Scottish authorities until more than seven years after the bombing; the trial was not completed and the verdict was not delivered until more than five years later; and the individual most responsible for the murders was never brought before the bar of justice.

The court found that Megrahi was an operative of the JSO, the Jamahariya Security Organization, Libya's secret service, "of fairly high rank." This finding by the court, of course, removed even the smallest of reasonable doubts that the government of Libya, namely, its autocratic, dictatorial leader then and now, Moammar Gadhafi, was likely involved in approving if not planning and directing the bombing.

With the trial over, many people in the West are calling for an official end to the UN and U.S.-imposed sanctions against Libya. Justice has been served they say. The economy and the people of Libya should no longer be punished. In addition, they assert, Moammar Gadhafi played a constructive role in agreeing to submit his nationals to the justice system of the western world; moreover, he appears no longer to be embroiled with terrorists.

Conscience and justice should determine the next steps by the West toward Libya and its ruler. Apologies for terrorists and the governments that direct them can never be a substitute for justice, however imperfect.

LET OUR PEOPLE GO

On July 1, in the city of Shiraz in Iran, the Iranian Revolutionary Court convicted 10 Jews on the false charge of spying for Israel. They languish in jail now, some for up to 9 years. Each one must be remembered. They are: Javeed Beit Yakov, Ramin Farzam, Nasser Levi Haim, Farzad Kashi, Faramarz Kashi, Ramin Nemati, Shahrokh Paknahad, Farhad Saleh, Hamid Tefileen and Asher Zadmehr.

Questions leadership

It should be noted that the significant Toronto community rally for Jerusalem with Natan Sharansky was organized without the participation or support of the Canadian Jewish Congress, Canada-Israel Committee and other established community groups. The leadership of the CJC refused both to endorse the rally and to join 150 other prominent Canadian Jews in signing a public statement recognizing Jerusalem as the undivided capital of Israel, considering such gestures to be "too political."

Yet, curiously, the same leadership did not hesitate to warmly welcome Faisal Husseini, Yasser Arafat's "minister in charge of Jerusalem" (whose is bent on "de-Judaizing" Jerusalem) to Toronto a couple of years ago.

A debt to Mendel

Further to your article "U of T will honour pioneer's home" (CJN, Jan. 4), Jack Granatstein is my first cousin. We are not descendents of Mendel Granatstein. Mendel was our great-grandfather's brother and our grandfather's uncle. Our common ancestor is Mendel's father.

Nevertheless, our family is indebted to Mendel because he brought our grandparents and parents to Canada and gave our grandfather a job.

I remember Mendel coming to my father's store on College Street in a large, black, chauffeur-driven car. By that time he was quite elderly and was referred to affectionately as "Old Man Granatstein."

Also, Jack spent his academic career at York University, although I'm sure the University of Toronto would be more than happy to claim his as one of their own.

To complete this lesson in Jewish geography, Sheldon Godfrey, a classmate of mine at the University of Toronto law school, had an aunt, Bella Godfrey, who was married to my uncle, Charlie Granatstein.

Circumcision clarification

I would like to clarify one of the statements ascribed to me in Paul Lungen's article "Rights body denies issuing policy on circumcision" (CJN, Jan. 25).

Mr. Lungen wrote, "Antonopoulos suggested the discussion [regarding circumcision] could prove 'troublesome' to Jews who practise circumcision for religious reasons."

What I expressed to Mr. Lungen was my view that as Jews – alongside the whole of the society – become familiar with recently identified implications (ethical and other) of infant circumcision of which they have not been previously aware, a growing number may be expected to find the procedure troubling.

I also indicated my recognition that inasmuch as the discussion relates to a practice central to their religion and tradition, Jews stand to find the general debate over circumcision difficult and challenging.

Says she was misquoted

Re: Ron Csillag's article about the recent roundtable held in Thornhill on school-funding alternatives ("No school funding this term: MPP," CJN, Feb. 1).

I read the article with interest. The meeting, which was held at the initiative of Thornhill's MPP, Tina Molinari, was a first in our efforts to move this issue forward.

I was quoted as saying I was "disappointed but not surprised" that the government was not planning to fund denominational schools in this mandate. I specifically stated that I was not disappointed, nor was I surprised at this. I would like to correct this statement and state for the record that after the meeting I felt we had taken a significant step forward in our efforts to get the ear of this government on this important issue.

Israel's survival paramount

I was heartened by Simon Schweitzer's reply "Stop worrying about world opinion" (Letters to the editor, CJN, Jan. 4), to Ira Zbarsky.

In his letter, Mr. Zbarsky argues that only world Jewry is in a position to stop Israel's aggressive stance. He continues by saying that the State of Israel is under a threat of destruction. I find these statements incongruent and in conflict with each other.

Mr. Schweitzer, a Holocaust survivor, aptly refers to Mr. Zbarsky as a prophet of doom. Surely, the latter does not expect Israel to roll over and be trampled into the dust. Mr. Schweitzer's implication, that Israel will not be willing prey to those who wish to destroy her, is correct and visionary.

Can't we glean anything from the lessons of history? Didn't Chamberlain appease Hitler? To what end? Didn't profound Jewish writers like I. L. Peretz dare Jews to cry out, forsaking their silence?

In the case of Israel's survival, silence will not be golden. Though world opinion does matter, the existence of the State of Israel remains paramount.

Tall tales of trees for Tu b'Shvat

By MICHAEL BROWN
Jewish Telegraph Agency

Tu b'Shvat gives parents the opportunity to share with their children the importance of trees in everyday life. Jewish tradition is full of parables using trees to convey messages.

* * *

This tale happens to specify a carob tree, but it could just as well have been an olive, fig or even a mulberry tree. The message remains the same.

Honi and the Carob Tree

One day when Honi, the righteous man, was out walking, he came upon a man planting a carob tree.

"How long will it be before this tree bears fruit?" Honi asked.

"Seventy years," the man replied.

"How do you know you'll be alive in 70 years?" Honi asked.

"Just as I found carob trees when I came into the world, so I am now planting carob trees for my grandchildren to enjoy," answered the man.

Honi then sat down to have a meal and fell asleep.

When he awoke, he saw a man gathering the fruit of the carob tree and he asked him, "Are you the man who planted this tree?"

The man replied: "I am his grandson."

Honi therefore realized that he had slept for 70 years.

(Babylonian Talmud, Taanit 23a)

Some folk tales help explain particular characteristics of trees. The next story is about the olive tree. Olive trees tend to become hollow as they get older because they get their nourishment from the thin layer of inner bark just underneath the outer bark.

The Grieving Olive Tree

After the Babylonians destroyed the First Temple, there was widespread grief and mourning throughout the country. To demonstrate their extreme grief, all the trees of the country shed their leaves. After the trees were bare, they noticed that the olive tree – which is by nature an evergreen – still retained its leaves.

Representatives of the trees approached the olive tree and asked, "Why don't you shed your leaves in grief over the destruction of the Temple?"

The olive tree responded: "You, my brothers, show your grief on the outside for all to see. My grief will be carried within for all times."

And so it is that each year the olive tree eats away at itself in grief and sorrow until it is nothing more than a hollow strip of bark.

* * *

The following story concerns the Oriental strawberry tree. This particularly striking tree can be found growing in the Galilee, Carmel and Judean mountains. Its most noteworthy characteristic is its red bark, which has been associated throughout the ages with bloodshed.

How the Katlav Tree Came to Be

One day, a young shepherd got embroiled in an argument with his father over the affections of a young woman. Words were said on both sides as tempers flared. Suddenly, in anger, the shepherd raised the staff in his hand and struck his father, killing him. In shock, the son threw the bloodstained staff to the ground, where it sprouted.

Sacred trees and groves are scattered throughout Israel. Many of them are quite old, and many folk tales have arisen concerning their origins as well as their special powers.

This story concerns a sacred grove in the Galilee village of Peki'in. On the outskirts of the village is a cave and an ancient carob tree that is connected to the talmudic sage Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai and his son. According to legend, the pair were nourished by the fruit of the tree and a magical spring of water while they hid from the Romans. Christian residents of the area also associate the grove with the sons of Jacob, and therefore refer to it as the carob trees of Bnei Ya'acov.

The Carob Trees of Bnei Ya'acov

It is told that the men of Ras-Abad collected a head tax from the residents of Peki'in, and every year they would come and take away for themselves one of the young girls of the village.

One year, it was one particular girl's turn, and the tax collectors arrived at the door of her home, which was next to the grove of carobs. The young girl hesitated and then she fled through the window and hid among the dense growth of trees. When the tax collectors noticed that she fled, they chased after her.

When the young girl saw her pursuers approaching near, she raised up her voice in a prayer to God that she would be saved from these strangers and she asked that the carob trees protect her.

Her prayer was answered: The branches of the carobs suddenly sprouted flames that burned anyone who tried to get near the girl. The flames also pursued the rest of the tax collectors and burned their clothing and their bodies. They fled far away from the village.

From then on, thanks to the carobs of the sons of Jacob, this tax was cancelled.

On Mount Carmel, there is an ancient grove of oak trees sacred to the Druze. According to tradition, there was an assembly here of 40 prophets. The following story takes place during World War I, when Turkish authorities were cutting down large numbers of trees throughout the country as fuel for their steam engines.

Grove of the 40

One day, the Turkish overseer cast his eyes on the Grove of the 40. He yelled to his Druze workers to cut down the trees, but they refused. Angrily, he summoned the Turkish soldiers and ordered them to cut down the trees, but they also refused.

Dismissing the fears of the workers and soldiers, the overseer decided to demonstrate his courage in this regard. He grabbed an axe and approached one of the trees. Raising the mighty axe, he took aim at the tree. However, as the axe neared the tree, his arm withered and became useless. Thus the grove was spared.

A notable event

Jewish news has a way of depicting the dark side of life; for all too long we were victims of history. It is not surprising, therefore, that many of us assume that news about the Israeli-Palestinian confrontation will be automatically prejudiced in favour of the latter. That, however, is another matter with which I hope to deal at a future time, when hopefully the threatening clouds of war will have passed and give us time to reflect more calmly on what has happened and what needs to be.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

For today, I have some good news, which leans heavily on an article by Theresa Argovino that appeared in the electronic version of the Chronicle of Higher Education. The article records the opening of the first rabbinical seminary in Germany – the first, that is, since the Holocaust.

Before the war, there were three rabbinical colleges in Germany and one in Austria. The last one closed in 1942.

On Nov. 10, 2000, the first rabbinical college established in a German-speaking country since World War II, was opened. Called the Abraham Geiger College, it will begin accepting students in the spring.

The name of the new college recalls the German theologian who, in 1836, proposed that theological studies be situated within a proper university department, with the objective of combining the study of Jewish tradition with an academic approach. Abraham Geiger founded Germany's three rabbinical seminaries. In 1934-35, I attended one of them, the Hochschule fuer die Wissenschaft des Judentums, before I left for America.

The new institution will be located in Potsdam, a small town close to Berlin. It was chosen as the site of the college because the University of Potsdam has a Jewish studies department and because there are three universities in nearby Berlin where students can also take classes.

The college will be housed in the Moses Mendelssohn Institute, a Jewish studies centre. Funds have been raised by private individuals, as well as from a few Jewish groups. Tuition will be free.

The founders of the college were rabbis Walter Jacob and Walter Homolka, who worked tirelessly and against much opposition on the project. Rabbi Jacob is the retired rabbi of Rodef Shalom Congregation in Pittsburgh, and Rabbi Homolka, of German birth, has been active in organizing Germany's growing Jewish community.

In his opening address, Rabbi Homolka said, "We will remember what has happened in the past, but it is time to build a future."

I wish the college well and I hope that it will be able to live up to its potential.

And the winner is?

This column is being written before the Israeli election, and will be published right after it. All the more reason to beware of making any predictions. But precisely because the results are not known to me at the time of writing, this is an appropriate moment for some last pre-election reflections on the candidates and our reactions to them.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

If Ariel Sharon wins, it will be because enough Israelis in the centre decide he understands their short-term need for firmness and their anger with Yasser Arafat, and because enough Israeli Arabs cannot overcome their resentment at the Barak government's mishandling of their violent demonstrations early in the fall.

The right alone cannot deliver a victory to Sharon, and he knows that in order to get their vote, he must campaign, like Benjamin Netanyahu before him, on a peace platform. But what will he ultimately deliver? Sharon has been described as an "olive tree" leader, as in Tom Friedman's juxtaposition, The Lexus and the Olive Tree. In other words, his natural frame of reference is an attachment to the land along with a more parochial discourse and belief system. Sharon as prime minister will have the choice of using that conviction to continue to urge Israelis towards a pragmatic resolution of the conflict with the Palestinians, or of leaning towards ideological nationalism, leading to greater isolation and the costs associated with the status quo. History is written by winners, and Sharon has the choice of legacies at this point in his political career.

If Ehud Barak wins, it will be because enough disenchanted Barak supporters realize that the "blank ballot" option is a meaningless gesture of protest, and because enough Israeli Arabs revert to their familiar, pro-Labor voting pattern. If this unlikely scenario unfolds, it will be the greatest comeback story in Israel's history. If Barak loses, he will have fallen victim to three factors – his dismal failure as a politician, the Israeli electoral system, and Arafat's rejection of his peace offer. Had any one of these been different, his political fortunes would likely have fared better.

Whoever the prime minister is, a national unity government will be an attractive option for three reasons: to ensure Sharon and Barak's political survival, to maintain a parliamentary majority to prevent Netanyahu's comeback, and to reform the electoral system to deal with the self-evident weaknesses of the dual-ballot system.

For Israelis, there is no turning the clock back. Yitzhak Shamir inherited Menachem Begin's Camp David process, Rabin inherited Shamir's Madrid conference, Netanyahu inherited Yitzhak Rabin's Oslo, and Barak continued where Netanyahu left off in the Wye agreement. Sharon may believe in a firmer reaction to Arafat's violence and rejection of Israel's offers, and some of the intractable issues may not now have solutions, but he cannot escape the new realities of the Israeli-Palestinian relationship. For the first time, both communities have come up against the most fundamental issues of their violent history – Jerusalem, settlements and the Palestinian "right of return." And for the first time, both are debating the respective price of compromise or inaction. Barak may well go down in history as Israel's weakest prime minister, but he will always be remembered as the leader who exposed the raw nerves of this existential conflict.

For our Jewish community, this is precisely the time to affirm our support for Israel and its democratic process, regardless of who heads its government. The winner will have been elected in an open, due process, and friends of Israel, including the Canadian government, should welcome the result as such. Whatever one may think about Sharon's past actions or future policies, his legitimacy as a potential prime minister derived from the very principles of accountability and censure inherent in Israel's parliamentary system.

Here, our overarching objective remains to ensure Canadian government support for Israel and its security, and the continued enhancement of the positive, multifaceted Canada-Israel bilateral agenda. This includes numerous, significant issues on the economic, political and international agendas that go beyond the narrow prism of United Nations votes, as unfortunate as these may be. Israel needs Canada's support and actions. Our voice counts – let's use it wisely.

Dubya: good or bad for the Jews?

Now that George W. Bush has been sworn in, American Jews can begin playing the game of Jewish politics in earnest. They have their work cut out for them, however. Whatever they may have thought of Bill Clinton, there is no doubt that an Al Gore presidency was their top choice. They are now on the outs.

Marion Wenafeld in Montreal

As in all recent elections, American Jews voted for the Democrats in large majority, far greater than any white religious or ethnic group. The Jews' stubborn adherence to liberal values and Democratic voting preferences continues unabated. While there are prominent American Jewish conservatives like Bill Kristol, Charles Krauthammer, William Safire and Dennis Prager, there is no great movement of Jews to the right.

A recent survey conducted by American sociologist Steven M. Cohen illustrates just how liberal American Jews are and how out of step they are with other Americans. (His sample, surveyed in 2000, included fewer Orthodox respondents than other surveys, but better sampling would not eliminate the general pattern.) Given their high economic status, the Jewish tilt toward liberalism remains quite pronounced.

American Jews remain vehemently opposed to any religious accommodations in public schools. They are far more opposed to things like teaching creationism, school voucher programs and allowing public schools to display the Ten Commandments – never mind a cross – than are American non-Jews. Among Jews, 59 percent think of themselves as Democrats and 32 percent take a "liberal" stand on political issues, compared to 31 and 19 percent for non-Jews.

Differences are even more pronounced on specific issues: 88 percent of Jews compared to 58 percent of non-Jews think abortions should be available to anyone who wants one; 52 percent compared to 32 percent support legal marriage for gays and lesbians.

At some point, Republican administrations generally figure out that the organized Jewish community is not their ally. Indeed, surveys show that the American Jewish communal leadership is often more liberal than rank and file Jews.

American Jews have survived Republican administrations before, and they will survive this one as well. Dubya, like his father, has been socialized in a world far removed from Jews. (Ronald Reagan, by contrast, was comfortable with Jews and Jewish sensibilities because of his Hollywood background.) The Republican party in Texas and Texas oil companies are not known for their Jewish representation.

Jews were not included among Bush's initial cabinet appointments, though some will play roles as foreign policy advisors. Several commentators have made sporadic, often veiled, comments about the absence of Jews in the cabinet and in Bush's inner circle. One New York Times article reviewed Dubya's days at Yale, noting that he resented the "East Coast elitists." This does not refer to Anglo-Protestant graduates of fancy prep schools.

If things unravel in the Middle East, how will the new administration respond? James Baker, key advisor of the Republican recount team in Florida, will likely serve as an important advisor to the new president. Baker was not known as a major friend of Israel during his tenure as secretary of state.

Most pundits assume that as president, Bush will disengage from micro-managing the world's trouble spots. Bush's explicit retreat from a "nation" role in the world means that countries in trouble will have to solve their problems themselves, as long as American interests are not directly involved. The increasing size and wealth of the American Arab and/or Muslim population may become a factor in Middle East policy. But this administration is unlikely to abandon Israel.

A far greater challenge for American Jews will be the possibility of a new round of "culture wars" in the United States. Here, select individuals with high visibility will play a key role in preventing Jews from becoming too isolated, too exposed, as a vocal point-setting group on the liberal left.

Dr. Laura Schlessinger, the conservative Jewish radio personality, has a far stronger following among American Christians than among American Jews. Even Senator Joe Lieberman's brand of cultural and moral conservatism will be pressed into service. The minority of American Jewish conservatives will assume centre stage. Liberal American Jews will have to hold tight and ride out this storm.

The Kirshner File

The misleading notions of Edward Said

The Palestinian national movement has precious few spokespersons as capable of articulating its positions as Edward Said, a former advisor to PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat and a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia University. Born in Jerusalem and raised in Cairo, Said studied at Harvard and Princeton, and is the author of, among other works, Orientalism and The Question of Palestine.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although Said – a Christian Palestinian – has made his academic mark as a literary scholar, he is probably best known as an ardent advocate of the Palestinian cause.

With the signing of the 1993 Oslo accords, he broke ranks with Arafat, claiming they were "an instrument of Palestinian surrender." Since then, Said has written a torrent of newspaper and magazine articles demeaning Oslo as a sellout and attacking Arafat and the Palestinian Authority as ineffectual and corrupt. These pieces, 50 in number, have been gathered together in a provocative new book, The End of the Peace Process: Oslo and After (Random House).

Objectionable though some of his views are, Said is worth reading because he represents an important constituency in the Palestinian camp: the unreconstructed segment that has never stopped questioning Israel's very existence and believes that it should be supplanted by a so-called secular, democratic state where Jews, Muslims and Christians would supposedly coexist in a gauzy state of peace, harmony and brotherhood.

Said's panacea for the Arab-Israeli dispute, though cloaked in a humanist patina, would turn back the clock by decades. It would, in one grand stroke, completely erase the hard-won diplomatic achievements of the past two decades during which Israel's niche in the Middle East has been recognized by at least two Arab states, Egypt and Jordan.

Curiously enough, Said takes exception to critics who brand him as an outright rejectionist. As he puts it: "I am totally in favour of peace by coexistence, self-determination and equality between the Israeli and Palestinian peoples on the land of historical Palestine, and I am therefore exactly the opposite of an opponent of peace."

Elaborating on this theme, he rejects the thesis that Israel should be destroyed and that its Jewish inhabitants be dispossessed. "... The fantasy of somehow removing Israel and its people is... unthinkable. Yes, they can be made to withdraw from the occupied territories, but it is a dream to expect that 'they' will disappear or go back to Poland, Russia, America."

Linking this hypothesis to his supposition that "Palestinian self-determination in a separate state is unworkable," Said posits his central argument. "Israelis and Palestinians are too intertwined with each other in history, experience and actuality to separate, even though each proclaims the need for separate statehood," he observes. "The challenge is to find a peaceful way in which to coexist not as warring Jews, Muslims and Christians, but as equal citizens of the same land."

In other words, Israel should be replaced by a secular entity. Said, a sophisticated and erudite writer, lacks the courage of his convictions to come straight out and say unequivocably, I cannot accept Israel in its present form. Let us, as human beings created in the same image, dismantle Israel and build a replacement state on its ashes. If truth be told, Said's position is a jarring throwback to the bad old days when rejection of Israel's simple right to exist as a Jewish/Zionist state was an article of faith among Arabs.

By advancing this view, Said blithely casts aside three major developments that have transformed the Middle East: the belated decision by the PLO to abandon its myopic, self-defeating policy of insistence on a single secular state for Jews and Arabs; and Egypt's and Jordan's historic rapprochement with Israel in 1979 and 1995, respectively.

Given his druthers, Said would bury these landmarks, all for the sake of resurrecting an idea whose time has come and gone. If that is not retrogressive thinking, what is?

Said, whose misguided goodwill and naiveté animate this collection of essays, proceeds from the assumption that Oslo has proven to be a "deeply flawed and unworkable" framework. It should be noted that The End of the Peace Process was published before the collapse of last July's Camp David summit and the subsequent outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

In excoriating Oslo, Said argues that it has given the Palestinians "a series of municipal responsiblities in Bantustans controlled from the outside by Israel. What Israel has secured is official Palestinian consent to Israeli occupation." Israel and the United States, he claims, have not the slightest interest in guaranteeing Palestinian statehood.

Oslo, it is true, has chugged along in fits and starts, and one cannot deny that right-wing political circles in Israel clearly oppose real Palestinian sovereignty. Yet Oslo, its flaws notwithstanding, laid the foundations for an incremental resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians. And Ehud Barak's willingness to withdraw from all of Gaza and much of the West Bank, so as to accommodate an independent Palestinian state, proves the basic invalidity of Said's thesis.

Edward Said

Said also errs in his appraisal of Barak. "Barak has been greeted as the peace candidate," he writes, "but given his background and what he has said and done so far, I am certain that his ideas are not different enough from [Benjamin] Netanyahu's to warrant great optimism." Even a biased observer would concede that Barak, considering the territorial concessions he has been willing to make for peace, is not cut from the same cloth as Netanyahu or, for that matter, Ariel Sharon.

In tacitly arguing for a secular state in place of Israel, Said – a self-professed adversary of terrorism who disapproves of suicide bombings as "morally unacceptable" and "strategically unproductive" – displays an emphatic side all too often absent among Palestinian intellectuals when the topic at hand is Israel.

He clearly recognizes Israel's accomplishments, saying that "the fundamental challenge that Israel poses is to ourselves – our inability to organize, our inability to dedicate ourselves to a basic set of principles from which we do not deviate, our inability to marshal our resources singlemindedly, our inability to devote all our efforts to education and competence."

And, Said notes, Israeli Jews are not "white settlers of the stripe that colonized Algeria or South Africa." In acknowledging the long history of anti-Jewish persecution, Said urges Arabs "to recognize the realities of the Holocaust," and to jettison the "creepy, nasty wave of anti-Semitism and hypocritical righteousness insinuating itself into our political thought and rhetoric."

Writing in this vein, Said – who was embarrassingly photographed hurling a rock at an Israeli guardhouse from the Lebanese border last summer – implores Palestinian and Arab intellectuals to engage their Israeli Jewish counterparts "openly, courageously and uncompromisingly." To drive home the point, he poses a rhetorical question: "What have years of blanket refusal to deal with Israel done for us. Nothing at all, except to weaken us."

But for what end? A "third way" that avoids "the bankruptcy" of Oslo and "the retrograde policies of total boycott." A "concept of citizenship" consistent with a non-sectarian state. Said's notions, when carefully scutinized, are the stuff of a pipedream and a prescription for Israel's eradication.

Said rips into Arafat

Edward Said is persona non grata as far as Yasser Arafat is concerned. In innumerable articles, and now in The End of the Peace Process (Random House), he has mercilessly flayed Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority (PA). No wonder Said is on Arafat's enemies list.

The PA, he writes scathingly, tolerates neither due process nor real freedoms and democratic rights. "Arafat wants to rule in his own way, unilaterally and without any significant civil interference." Furthermore, he adds, Arafat and his associates resort to censorship not just to silence and threaten opponents, but also to hide past mistakes from discussion and accountability.

Describing Arafat as an "incompetent general," Said accuses him of tolerating a system of monopolies that enrich cronies and impoverish ordinary Palestinians. "With his corruption he has stripped his own people of their resources (and) squandered their wealth."

Said is extremely critical of Arafat's handling of the Olso peace process, claiming that he tacitly co-operated with Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Comparing him unfavourably to South African leader Nelson Mandela, Said says that Arafat has "trampled on principle, sold out on commitment, and emptied language of any connection with political truth."

Quite an indictment.

Court action seeks end to Lord's Prayer in legislature

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last autumn, a quiet meeting took place between representatives of every major faith group in Ontario and Gary Carr, Speaker of Ontario's legislature, to discuss the daily recitation of the Lord's Prayer in the legislature.

The faith groups, including representatives from the Jewish community, wanted a solution to the ritual that would satisfy everyone; either a moment of silence or a non-denominational prayer.

Carr said his job simply entails carrying out the wishes of the 103 MPPs, and that he would be ready to do away with the Lord's Prayer if that was what members wanted. He said he would help arrange a meeting between the religious leaders and the three house leaders to discuss the matter.

The house leaders, apparently, declined the meeting.

That's when Henry Freitag decided to go to court.

"Yes, that's pretty much how it happened," the 72-year-old resident of Penetanguishene told The CJN in a telephone interview last week. "They didn't want to live by law and order."

Last week, Freitag filed an affidavit in Ontario's Superior Court of Justice alleging that the recitation of the Lord's Prayer before the daily sitting of the legislature violates the freedom of religion provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Freitag is asking the legislature to "cease and desist" the practice because the prayer is "exclusionary and can be interpreted as an endorsement of the Christian religion as the official religion of the government and legislature of Ontario."

The documents state that he feels "intimidated and uncomfortable" by the prayer's recitation, "forced to rise" for it, and feels "great pressure to join in its recitation."

Freitag is no stranger to this. In 1999, he won a major victory when Ontario's Court of Appeal overturned a lower decision and ruled 3-0 that the recitation of the Lord's Prayer at the start of town council meetings in Penetanguishene was unconstitutional.

The court ruled the practice "imposed a Christian moral tone" on proceedings and that everyone was entitled to attend a council meeting without feeling pressure to conform to the religious practices of the majority.

It was Freitag who began the action, saying he felt "coerced" to stand and recite the prayer.

"This is just the continuation of that fight," he said. "The law is the law. Without it you have anarchy, and I've had enough of anarchy."

His victory effectively put an end to a century-old tradition of opening local council meetings with the prayer. Some municipalities in Ontario, however, have ignored the ruling and still use the prayer.

Last March, Canadian Jewish Congress asked Carr to abide by the Court of Appeal ruling and end the practice at the legislature, saying that reciting the Lord's Prayer sets "a Christian moral tone in the chamber."

Carr responded that only MPPs can bring about change. As well, he said, the legislature is subject to parliamentary immunity. Thus, the court cannot interfere in its "internal" practices.

Freitag rejects that explanation.

"The legislature has parliamentary privilege. They can call each other idiots. But they cannot promote Christianity over a loudspeaker."

Freitag does not necessarily seek a prayer-free legislature. A moment of silence, as is the practice in the House of Commons, or a non-denominational prayer, would be fine with him.

MPPs are not required to recite the Lord's Prayer. When they stand, it is because the Speaker has entered the chamber. They remain standing until the Speaker sits, which he does not do until the opening prayer is finished.

Freitag's lawyer, Ed Morgan, a University of Toronto constitutional law expert, told The CJN the real issue in this case is the Speaker's claim of parliamentary immunity.

"The courts have already dealt with the freedom of religion claim. We'll be raising the issue of the Speaker's administrative duties," said Morgan, who is also Congress's honorary legal counsel.

Media reports last week described Freitag as a Jewish Holocaust survivor.

"Well, my mother was half-Jewish," he recalled. "I remember as a very young child seeing some Jewish objects in the house."

The German-born retired construction worker once spent three weeks at a Nazi detention centre in Berlin. His mother died in a bombing raid and Freitag spent the rest of the war living as a Christian. He came to Canada in 1956.

In any event, Freitag has endured a few anti-Semitic taunts and even death threats by mail.

Building Relationships for Life

Group offers hope for Jewish addicts, families

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One late night six months ago, the comfortable Jewish world of "Harry" and "Elaine" was turned upside down and inside out. They got a telephone call from their daughter-in-law in California, who tearfully revealed she was leaving the Toronto couple's 31-year-old son.

"She told us our son had a drug problem," says Harry (the 50-something couple requested their real names not be used for this article). "It turned out it was more than that. He had been doing cocaine heavily for at least a year-and-a-half."

An earlier visit to their son hinted at his changed behaviour. "He had mood swings. He was staying out late. He wasn't getting up for work," recalls his mother, nearly choking on her words. He had also maxed out all his credit cards. "This was my baby. We just thought he was under stress from work." No one suspected that a good Jewish boy was hooked on hard drugs.

Harry and Elaine then got on the phone with their son for the next six hours. "He was in total denial," recalls his father. Adds Elaine: "I told him, 'You have to get yourself into counselling.' This was a night no parent should go through."

They convinced their son to get help. He chose well, checking into the world-famous Gateways Beit T'Shuvah in Los Angeles, the only residential Jewish addiction rehabilitation program in the United States. Founded in 1987 on principles put forward by Abraham Twersky, the maverick drug counsellor and Orthodox rabbi, the centre combines a therapeutic and spiritual approach based on integrating Jewish wisdom with psychotherapy and the traditional 12-step recovery program.

Their son is a changed man now, clean and sober and ready to re-enter the world drug-free. He'll be checking out in about two weeks.

But what of his nerve-wracked parents?

"We didn't know what to do, where to turn to," sighs Harry. "We felt so helpless, completely powerless." Says Elaine: "A lot of Jewish families have this image of perfection. We did too. But now we know Jewish families can be affected, too."

They turned to one of the established 12-step recovery groups, and the next day, saw an ad in The CJN. Both touted Jewish Alcoholics, Chemically Dependent Persons and Significant Others, a mouthful better known as JACS.

Set up in Toronto last autumn as a Jewish Family & Child Service program, JACS has grown as have few other Jewish organizations. Reaction to it at first was tentative, as the community sized up a long-awaited attempt in Toronto to deal with Jewish addiction to booze and drugs – and the massive denial that comes with the problem.

But in just two months, the JACS telephone hotline (416-410-JACS) has logged nearly 200 calls from addicts and their loved ones, reports Marla Goldman, one of the group's overworked volunteer co-ordinators and herself a recovering addict.

The group has established a storefront location, JACS Place (858 Sheppard Ave. W.), which is already bursting at the seams. Weekly meetings began with five people; the last one attracted nearly 50. Plans call for more frequent sessions, including information meetings the third Sunday of every month, starting Feb. 18.

"Thank God we found JACS," enthuses Elaine. "I don't know what would have happened if we hadn't." The couple has found succour in the traditional 12 steps, beginning with the idea that they and their son were powerless over his abuse.

"I never thought I would travel down this path, never thought this could happen to me," says Elaine. "I mean, he was raised in a good Jewish home and went to Hebrew school.

"But now I know this is a disease, and there's no cure for it." Only recovery.

Initially, Elaine, knowing how close-knit the Jewish community is, was apprehensive that someone she knew would spot her at a JACS meeting. But soon, concerns about shame and embarrassment melted away. "We met addicts and their families, and I was able to share. Now, I'm practicing the 12 steps to the best of my ability. They have given me insight into how an addict lives his life."

Adds her husband: "I felt as though every word was directed at us."

According to JACS and every similar group, it's a myth that families of addicts and alcoholics don't need help. And to explode another myth – that Jews don't drink or do drugs – JACS uses a 1992 New York study that found the incidence of alcoholism and drug abuse was the same among Jews as in society in general – between 10 and 12 percent.

But that's not the whole story. Studies have also shown that a minimum of three other people – loved ones, friends, business associates – are directly affected.

In Toronto, the extrapolation is staggering: it could mean that with a Jewish population of 175,000, there are up to 20,000 addicted Jews and three times that many collateral victims.

JACS was founded in New York in 1979 and has to date helped thousands of Jews through kosher retreats and a 12-step program tailored to reflect Jewish values. Those behind it stress that it's not a treatment program. It points people in the right direction and gives them the tools to deal with the problem. It also promises complete anonymity.

Through therapy with their son, Elaine and Harry discovered that his problems were deeply rooted. It turned out that as a child, he had been sexually abused by a counsellor at a summer camp, and verbally abused by a family member.

The whole experience with JACS has also left Elaine and Harry more spiritual. That's an integral component of the 12 steps; seven of them mention God or a higher power.

How should Jews view JACS? Harry has a suggestion: "Set pride aside, and leave your ego in the car. It can happen to us."

Our relationship with trees

By RABBI EDWARD ELKIN

Rabbinic Reflections

We Jews must be the only people in the world to have a special New Year dedicated to trees. This Thursday is that special New Year: Tu b'Shvat. On Tu b'Shvat, we eat fruit from trees, we sing songs about trees, we thank God for having given us trees. We support the planting of new trees in Israel by giving to the JNF. It is a wonderful celebration of a part of God's creation which most of us take for granted.

But if we think about it, we human beings haven't always had such an easy relationship with trees. After all, we got ourselves kicked out of the Garden of Eden on account of a tree. Adam and Eve ate from the Tree of Knowledge – and because of that sin they had to leave Paradise and go out into a world of hard work and problems and challenges and difficulties. This was not necessarily the most promising way to kick off the tree-human relationship, but that's what happened.

So why, we may ask, does our Jewish tradition bequeath us a New Year for trees? Whereas what we remember most about our Gan Eden experience is being forbidden to eat from a certain tree, on Tu b'Shvat we're supposed to eat from trees – from all manner of trees in fact, seven species of trees which grow in Eretz Yisrael, if we can manage it. It's almost as if on Tu b'Shvat we're going back to the scene of the crime, Paradise. What could this mean? Is it possible that we've learned something since the days of Adam and Eve which earns us this peek back into the Garden?

One answer may be found in this week's parshah, Beshallach, which contains the Song at the Sea (Shirat Hayam). This is the song which the children of Israel sang after God parted the waters of the Red Sea and rescued them from the Egyptians.

What does this song have to do with Tu b'Shvat? Well, Shirat Hayam is not just any song. This was our very first song. In my reading, this song showed God that we'd grown up quite a bit since the time we left Gan Eden. We'd learned how to thank Him from the deepest place in our hearts. And as the divine gift to us for finally being able to sing, God gave us Tu b'Shvat, a time when we can taste from the fruit of the tree without fear of incurring punishment, but with simple enjoyment and pleasure.

Why is singing so important? Somehow, being able to sing means that we can see something like the miracle at the sea and know that it was God who saved us. Yes, it is possible to express this idea in ordinary words too, but somehow there are times when a song comes from a place deeper in the heart than ordinary words, times when a song says things we just can't say with words.

We're not ready to go back into the Garden for good yet. We don't deserve it because we haven't completed our task of fixing this world so it's a better place for all. We haven't learned to sing a new song, a song of hope and security and safety and peace for all.

But for the time being, we can look in, even visit, the Garden. We can taste the Tu b'Shvat fruit, and we can sing out with all our heart as Israel did at the shore of freedom's sea.

The singles scene—organized chaos

By BOB NATANSON

Guest voice

Intermarriage is a growing concern, all across North America. The situation in Toronto is, undoubtedly, similar to those situations in other cities, perhaps even in those around the entire world. With the new millennium upon us, it is time to take a serious and scientific approach to this phenomenon.

The Jewish population in Toronto today consists of a veritable rainbow of diversity, in terms of demographics (geographical location, socio-economic status, and degree of religious observance), although this was not always the case. Prior to World War II, the Jewish community centred on the Annex and it was more or less homogenous. The post-war years changed everything.

Jewish community leaders often lament over the increasing rate of intermarriage, but the question arises as to, exactly, what tangible efforts are being made to combat it. The "battle," so to speak, is unfortunately tantamount to "preaching to the converted." Singles who are affiliated with synagogues or other Jewish institutions already have exposure to programs and events that encourage marriage-minded people to meet, although casual observation indicates that the majority of Jewish singles are secular, with no particular ties to any shul. It is these secular singles who are, effectively, being deserted.

What is the future of the continuity of the Jewish people when Jewish community leaders offer only lip service to the problem? What is the point of bailing water without making a concerted effort to pug the leaks?

Speaking on behalf of friends and myself, the solutions may be somewhat radical and unpleasant to consider. My friends and I do not eat kosher food exclusively. Nor do we observe the strict requirements of Shabbat. We also do not attend singles events that appear to be "nerdy." We do, however, feel extremely strong connections to our heritage and traditions and want to date and marry Jewish women and men and have Jewish children. Fortunately, it is possible to exist in a largely non-Jewish society without strong religious adherence and still maintain our Jewishness. We feel that we represent the majority of Toronto's Jewish singles community.

Why are there no full-time "professionals" in the community who are responsible for the quantifiable reduction in the rate of Jewish intermarriage? Why is the singles scene largely left in the hands of people who operate for profit?

Best estimates number the Jewish population in Toronto alone at about 150,000. Of this total, it is possible that one third are of retirement age or children, leaving 100,000 people. It is possible, again, that one third are already married, or "involved," leaving 50,000 people. Even if one assumes that half of these people have lost their sense of Jewish roots or have given up on dating, we are still left with 25,000 Jewish singles who need solutions to their social concerns. Why is an event which draws 200-300 people considered a success? Where are the other 24,000 people?

Criticism of the existing power structure would be extremely negative, without being accompanied by positive suggestions. With this in mind, the following proposals should be considered:

- A committee of community leaders should be formed. The committee could invite any interested parties to present their opinions, complaints, criticisms and suggestions before them for consideration.
- A qualified social psychologist should be hired on a permanent basis, one who is experienced in group dynamics – someone who will be responsible for dealing with these issues and can hire a staff to carry out innovative ideas.
- A telephone poll should be conducted by UJA volunteers, already calling donors, to look for singles and complete detailed questionnaires in order to get feedback from the people most affected by the problem.

We all agree that Jewish continuity is extremely important. We can teach our children Jewish history, traditions and religious practice, but marriage must precede family rearing. If assimilation results in children who are not Jewish, there will be no continuity at all.

Bob Natanson lives in Toronto.

Jewish Life

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The complexity of the simplest things

The holiday of Tu b'Shvat has arrived once again. It is always fascinating to contemplate this holiday in the paradox it represents.

Judaism is a religion that holds the abstract understanding of God as central. One of the core understandings of Judaism is that we do not worship the concrete, but always move our thoughts beyond the physical to the underlying meaning. And yet, once a year we focus upon the trees and commemorate the holiday devoted especially to them.

Certainly one could not get more concrete than to spend a day celebrating the trees.

Of course, there are important messages to be drawn from this holiday: messages of harmony within nature, ecological concerns about waste and the prohibitions concerning waste, to name a few. But can this holiday also be used to further our understanding of God? Can this very concrete day be harnessed to deepen our grasp of the Ultimate Abstract?

In Shir Hashirim (Song of Songs), one verse states: "As an apple tree among the trees of the wood, so is my beloved among the sons." The woman is extolling her beloved by comparing him to an apple tree. The rabbis of the midrash address this verse, focusing particularly on the elevated status of the apple tree.

In understanding the complexity of the image, it is important to remember that Shir Hashirim functions on many levels. First, it is a beautiful love poem spoken between a man and a woman. But the rabbis state that on another level, it is a description of the intimate relationship that exists between God and Israel. In this analogy, God is being compared to an apple tree, a somewhat unusual comparison.

The rabbis in Exodus Rabbah speak of this comparison and explain the image. Just as the apple is deceiving to the eye, so can one's first impressions of God be deceiving. Looking at the apple does not convey to the observer the beautiful surprises and delights to the palate that come with the first bite. The apple contains flavour and a beautiful scent that need all the senses to truly appreciate. And yet this fruit is not simply a pleasure to the senses but is an important source of vitamins and nutrients. This treasure of creation is all contained within a seemingly simple casing that one could easily bypass, without ever knowing the wonders that have been overlooked.

The beauty of God exists within the simplicity of the apple. The apple tree is the source of this beauty as well as the source of its simplicity.

It is the person who is engaged in an intimate relationship that can recognize the depth of their partner's existence.

Tu b'Shvat is a celebration of the trees, but that is merely the simple casing that surrounds the depth of this holiday. Every nuance in nature, every delight of the senses is merely another invitation to the beholder to engage with the Source. Tu b'Shvat opens the door beyond the concrete. The next time we prepare to bite into an apple, new meaning will exist in the words, "Blessed is the fruit of the tree."

Tu b'Shvat and the environment

Today, we look at Tu b'Shvat's holiday "seder" and see why the day has become important in the Jewish environmental movement.

Tu b'Shvat is the perfect time to assess how Judaism treats the environment. In Deuteronomy 20:19, we are told that when an army lays siege to a city, it must not destroy its fruit-bearing trees [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd4.asp?action=displaypage&book=5&chapter=20&verse=19&portion=48]. Eilon Schwartz of Jerusalem's Heschel Center for Environmental Learning and Leadership looks at this commandment against wanton destruction of nature and analyzes how humans are both dependent on – and responsible for – trees [http://www.jhom.com/topics/trees/bal_tashkhit.htm].

The Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL) [http://www.coejl.org] suggests that Tu b'Shvat is the appropriate time for Jews to take stock of their responsibility toward the environment: "Judaism teaches that we have a sacred obligation to the Creator, to creation and to future generations to safeguard and protect Earth's ecosystems…This Tu b'Shvat, as we eat of the fruit of the earth and celebrate with friends and family, let us consider how we each can tread more lightly on Earth, how we can help our Jewish institutions to practise more fully Judaism's environmental traditions, and how we all together can motivate our government to tend the public lands we all share."

The Orthodox Union runs the Pardes Project which studies how Jews should respond to several contemporary issues including ecology [http://www.ou.org/pardes/ecology.htm]. Their page also relates this story about Rabbi Avraham Yitzhak Hakohen Kook, chief rabbi of Palestine in the early 20th century. "After Minchah my teacher [Rav Kook], as was his custom, set out on a walk in order to focus his thoughts. I accompanied him. On the way, I plucked a flower. He trembled and said to me softly: 'Believe me, I have always been careful not to purposelessly pluck a blade of grass or a flower which could grow and develop; for there is no grass from below that does not have a mazel [force from above] from above imploring it, "Grow!" Each blade of grass says something, each stone whispers a secret, each creature utters a song.'"

The Lights in Action's Environment page [http://www.lia.org/enviro.html] also draws a parallel between this holiday and environmental awareness. It quotes 19th-century scholar Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch: "'Do not destroy anything!' is the first and most general call of God… 'If you destroy, if you ruin – at that moment you are not a human.'"

I also recommend a series of articles focusing on Tu b'Shvat and trees in Jewish Heritage online magazine [http://www.jhom.com/calendar/shevat/index.html]. Rabbi Arthur Waskow writes about Sharing God's Fruitfulness, there are midrashim about trees and much more.

Unlike that other holiday with the famous seder, Tu b'Shvat has its own lesser-known seder. In the 16th century, the Kabbalists of Safed compiled a Tu b'Shvat seder that involves enjoying the fruits of the tree, particularly those native to the Land of Israel, and discusses philosophical and kabbalistic concepts associated with the day. According to Aish HaTorah educational site, the seder is a great way to appreciate the bounty that we so often take for granted, and to develop a good and generous eye for the world around us [http://aish.com/holidays/tu_bshvat/]. Jerusalem's Diaspora Yeshiva's Seder [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/tubishvat/index1.htm] calls for 22 foods including red and white wine, olives, dates, walnuts and carobs.

Not only does the day have a seder; it even has its own haggadahs. You can check out several variations on the Internet such as The Trees are Davening [http://www.coejl.org/celebrate/tub_haggadah.shtml], another at Virtual Jerusalem [http://www.vjholidays.com/tubshvat/seder1.htm], Brian Fink's Environmental Seder [http://pages.prodigy.net/bfink/jewish/services/tuseder.htm] and Ari Davidow's Tu B'Shvat Seder Toolkit [http://www.ivritype.com/toolkits/#tubsh]. (Note: Davidow's Seder is in Adobe Acrobat format. In order to view it, you will need to download a free copy of Acrobat Reader [http://www.adobe.com/products/acrobat/readstep2.html].)

Toronto PNAI chapter disbands

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto chapter of PNAI – Parents of North American Israelis – has disbanded after more than 20 years.

The chapter, a member of an organization begun in New York in the mid-1970s, has "served its purpose," said Bernard Rubin, a past president and longtime member, reminiscing recently in the living room of Minabelle and Irving Haneford, members since the chapter's inception in 1978.

In its early years, the chapter was primarily a support group, Rubin, 74, recalled. At its height, there were more than 140 member families, making Toronto the second-largest chapter after Philadelphia. (The New York area had three chapters.)

One of the highlights, Rubin recalled, was hosting a 1986 convention in Toronto, with about 100 American delegates. "It was a marvellous convention," said Haneford.

Monthly programs were always Israel oriented, Rubin recalled, with speakers including Israeli shlichim, professors and diplomats, as well as local commentators on the Israeli scene. A meeting that stood out in Haneford's mind had a Toronto Star editor fielding questions about that paper's portrayal of Israel.

With aging membership (the age range is now 60s to 80s), numbers have dwindled, and there are few new members.

The Toronto chapter, which also included members from nearby smaller communities, was the last remaining Canadian chapter.

Over half the members plan to stay on as PNAI members at large. According to the organization's Web site [www.pnai.org], it has 2,800 families in over 40 chapters, and provides emotional and practical support in North America and Israel. An emergency loan fund administered by the Association of Americans and Canadians in Israel is one example.

Chapters in Winnipeg, Montreal and Ottawa have also closed. "A lot of chapters are struggling with this problem," said Rubin.

"I feel sad about it closing," said Minabelle Haneford, 80, who served as secretary and treasurer for the life of the chapter. "I did a lot of work, and I find it's a bit much for me now."

Other things have also changed. Most of the children of the original members are now established in Israel, noted Haneford.

They're "long past" needing the type of support from their parents that they used to, added Rubin.

When the Hanefords' daughter Marion Ronen, now a mother of four, made aliyah in 1969, it was hard to find household items like linens and appliances in Israel. Now, "you can purchase anything you need," said Haneford.

In the years since Rubin and his wife Norma joined PNAI in 1981, the biggest difference he's noted has to do with communication.

Past PNAI Toronto president Bernard Rubin, centre, presented certificates of appreciation to Charlie King and Minabelle Haneford at the chapter's closing luncheon. [Mollie Rothman photo]

The Rubins' telephone bills, reflecting the cost of staying in touch with their Israeli family – three of their four children and six of their nine grandchildren – once totalled between $300 and $400 a month. They would also rely on mail, waiting up to two weeks for a letter to arrive.

Now, with e-mail and lower long-distance rates, they've been able to stay in closer contact. It's not uncommon for them to talk to all three children in one day, Rubin said.

He noted, however, that his children would rather discuss family than politics.

Not that the topic is far from anyone's mind. A number of PNAI members have grandchildren serving in Israel's army, and some of the grandparents are waging their own fight for Israel's image in the media, an activity PNAI encourages.

In the past few months, Rubin estimates he's sent close to 15 letters to the editor.

But among themselves, PNAI members have abided by an apolitical policy. "We had people from all sides of the spectrum, vis-à-vis Israeli politics," said Rubin.

"We also had a full spectrum of religion," said Haneford, referring to the different denominations of Judaism. "It was a very amiable chapter, very friendly, like a family meeting, because we all had so much in common."

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg sees the Jewish people as a pioneering group facing the same challenge as the rest of the world – the struggle for power, freedom and dignity.

That struggle, and its effects, constituted the theme of a recent public lecture given by the rabbi at Beth Tzedec Congregation. Rabbi Greenberg kicked off a Beth Tzedec weekend, during which he gave five talks, with the lecture on Israel: Religion and State, Religion and Society.

Having recently returned from Israel, Rabbi Greenberg reported that the mood of Israelis is, in the wake of the recent violence, "almost depression, which is quite rare."

It's particularly important now to look at the big picture, said the rabbi, a leading Jewish thinker and president of the Jewish Life Network, the umbrella for Birthright Israel and other outreach projects.

We are living in an age of unprecedented power, said Rabbi Greenberg, speaking of the general population and citing examples in politics, medicine and the economy.

The past century, he said, has given rise to the "sense that there should be access to power, and that I can take my fate in my own hands." He mentioned women, blacks and the gay community as relevant examples.

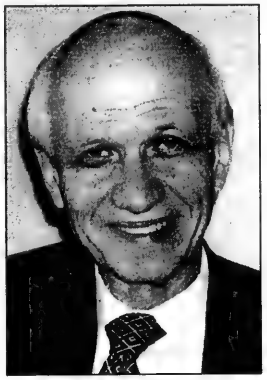
Rabbi Greenberg believes the changes have been primarily for the good. "Think of the indignity that was taken for granted, and no longer is accepted... Some of the most tyrannical governments of all time collapsed because people didn't take it for granted that they simply obey."

Zionism was the result of Jews demanding equality, and access to power and dignity, he said.

The Holocaust, which Rabbi Greenberg termed "the greatest denial of dignity, freedom and power" was also "an advance warning signal for all humanity," he said.

The lesson, he said, is that the search for freedom, power and dignity, if not controlled, can be destructive.

For the Jewish community, questions such as whether affluence will liberate people, or sweep away values, are relevant. Israel, he noted, serves as the standard by which the Jewish people is judged.



Rabbi Irving Greenberg

Having turned the deserts green affirms that Judaism is life-giving, as does taking people from poverty and giving them a new standard of health, the rabbi said, mentioning that Jews from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union as well as boat people from Cambodia and Vietnam were welcomed by Israel.

Rabbi Greenberg believes that Israel's record is "an extraordinary statement of Jewish ethical power," despite the Israeli-Arab situation which "has not been handled that great." He noted, in particular, the Sabra and Shatila massacres. The status of Arab Israelis is being improved, he said.

In contrast, he exhorted, "Look what happened in places like Bosnia, Kosovo and Rwanda, where the tensions explode into full-scale murder. Kahane was marginalized despite the terrorism. In Israel under the most extraordinary provocation, no party has been able to generate a mass following."

But Israel's not perfect, he said. To be too weak, he noted, would have meant not surviving. "In the real world, perfection is impossible."

That realization has been painful, the rabbi said. "One of the sustaining things about being Jewish was, we were powerless... but we felt completely righteous. Of course, it was a little bit self-flattering. Part of the reason we were so nice [was that] we weren't strong enough to hurt anyone. Part of the challenge when you take power is not to become cruel or out of control."

It's important not to lose sight of the Arab response to the restoration of the State of Israel, Rabbi Greenberg said. Arab nationalism, initially weak, has also gained strength, but it has "taken the easy path of using Israel as the frustration point instead of dealing with its own internal problems," he said.

The Jewish people find it very hard to see the ongoing casualties and suffering of the Palestinians as well as their own, he said. "The fact we know they are choosing to do this, and that their children are put out in front, doesn't help."

He sees no immediate prospect for a long term solution.

The rabbi also spoke of the religious-secular divide in Israel, and his pain over the modern Orthodox having "lost their way" as Haredim took over Orthodox leadership. "It worked in the beginning, because in Eastern Europe, the choice was Orthodox or secular."

One of the key elements, the rabbi believes, is the question of "renewing religion" in the State of Israel. "[We need] to build up the democratic competitive choices of Judaism prepared to take up the challenge of freedom."

Most Germans still seen as pro-Israel despite Palestinian uprising

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's image in Germany has been somewhat tarnished by the current Palestinian uprising, but the vast majority of Germans are still pro-Israel, says the president of the German-Israel Society.

In spite of the perception that Israel used excessive force against the Palestinians, particularly in the early phases of the intifadah, most Germans regard Israel in a positive light, said Manfred Lahnstein in an interview last week.

As a result, Israel's image in Germany remains "quite good and relatively stable," he said.

A former trade unionist and federal finance minister, he was here as a guest of Germany's consul general, Christiane Geissler-Kuss.

In biblical terms, he observed, the Palestinians are now perceived as David and Israel as Goliath.

Nevertheless, Israel's bilateral bonds with Germany have not been fundamentally affected by the violence, Lahnstein added.

A frequent visitor to Israel, he suggested that Israel's public relations response to the intifadah has been less than stellar.

"That tiny Israel is surrounded by100 million Arabs is all but forgotten."

Lahnstein argued that the German media picked up the theme of excessive force from Israeli critics and Israel's free press.

Blasting Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, Lahnstein claimed he is perceived as a figure out of an operetta. "No one takes him seriously. Look how he behaves."

Lahnstein said that German public opinion will judge Ariel Sharon, the Likud candidate for Israel's prime ministership, on the basis of his deeds, not his history.

Alluding to Sharon's performance in the 1982 war in Lebanon, he said, "If he commits similar blunders in the future, this will affect his image. Sharon doesn't have many friends outside Israel."

Lahnstein believes that the Oslo peace process is dead but that a new framework can be established.

Asked to describe Israel's relationship with Germany, he said, "We have excellent relations, but we'll never have normal relations."

Lahnstein ascribed Germans' interest in Israel to three factors: the Holocaust, the historical Jewish presence in Germany and "Holy Land traditions."

However, many young Germans have an affinity with Israel because of its high-tech economy and its "cultural vivacity."

Pointing out that Germany is Israel's biggest trade partner after the United States, he said, "We are Israel's leading partner in science and culture."

'That tiny Israel is surrounded by 100 million Arabs is all but forgotten'

The German-Israel Society, founded in 1966, has 5,000 members. According to Lahnstein, a member since 1967, it is by far the largest bilateral friendship society in Germany.

Lahnstein made his first visit to Israel in 1966, a year after Israel and Germany formally established diplomatic ties. It left an "indelible impression" on him, and since then, he has travelled to Israel almost 60 times.

"Israel is the most important driving force of my life," declared Lahnstein, who is also vice-chair of Haifa University.

He was born in Duesseldorf in 1937, and now lives in Hamburg. His father was an "ardent" Nazi, but his mother was a fierce opponent of National Socialism.

He brushed aside claims, articulated by some German Jewish leaders, that open anti-Semitism has become more respectable in Germany of late.

Urging Diaspora Jews to visit Germany, Lahnstein said he could understand and respect why they might be reluctant to do so.

In his view, right-wing extremism does not pose a clear and present threat to Germany's democratic system.

"It's nasty, criminal and despicable, but not a danger. We have to fight it all the time."

He urged the Constitutional Court in Germany to ban the far-right National Democratic Party.

"The NDP is dangerous because it offers an institutional framework for criminals."

Canadian Jewish students rise to the challenge

By EDDIE SHOSTAK
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — The goal of the recent Israel Activism retreat, according to its co-chair Maya Haasz, was to arm Jewish students with information, confidence and skills to become stronger leaders and Israel advocates on their campuses.

"We wanted to provide a forum where students from across the country could meet and find a more effective way to deal with problems common to all campuses," said Haasz, vice-president of Concordia Hillel. Haasz co-chaired the event with Tish Sabbah, a Marianopolis College student and the Israel affairs chair for Hillel Montreal.

Comment

Since September, students from across Canada have been placed in the difficult position of defending and promoting Israel on campus in extremely hostile environments.

The situation has been trying, exciting and frustrating all at the same time.

Trying, that is, because of the time and energy needed to portray Israel for what the country is – a state devoted to peace amidst a hostile region devoted to violence. Exciting because of the awakening of a new brand of Israel pride on campus. Frustrating because most students have felt powerless without the necessary knowledge and tools to do a good job.

The retreat, which addressed these issues, featured a diverse group of students, staff and lecturers who proved to be extremely energized, motivated and full of optimism.

Through the lectures, panels and various workshops, the students were empowered with information. Neil Lazarus, a political analyst and professional lecturer from Israel, proved to be a favourite at the retreat with his sharp humour and extremely effective lecture techniques.

According to Andrew Elbaz, a Law student at Université de Montréal and former student president of Hillel Montreal, Jewish students left the retreat "empowered to fulfil what I believe to be the moral obligation of Jewish student leaders to educate and promote Israel on campus. After all, if they don't do it, nobody else will.

"Another important element that was tackled was a certain persecution complex that certain campuses in Canada are victims of. There is no need to constantly react to every little piece of anti-Israel propaganda on campus. Jewish students have to assume a more creative and proactive approach in educating students on Israel."

The development of task forces, made up of students from across the country, will serve as a link between campuses for the future and a follow-up to the retreat, which will only be strengthened by future projects.

To provide guaranteed immediate and long-term follow-up, the launch of a national based, student initiated and student maintained Web site was announced.

The site, www.israelpride.com, serves as an educational and activist resource centre geared mainly towards Canadian students. In addition, there was an announcement of the initiation of a large-scale project – a national student organization devoted to Israel education, activism and social events on campus.

Eddie Shostak, a student at McGill University, is president of McGill Hillel and chairman and editor-in-chief of www.israelpride.com.

Students devise pro-Israel strategies

Bensimon said the weekend included the formation of a "core" group of students who would seek to ensure that activities, ranging from information-giving to ad campaigns, would be available at all campuses across Canada.

Avi Finegold, co-president of Concordia Hillel, said plans are also in the works to compile an e-mail list of Jewish students in Canada that would allow them to "network" in a more integrated way and keep them apprised of events at campuses.

"We found that students at other universities, such as the University of Waterloo, didn't really know what's been happening at Concordia," the site of particularly active pro-Palestinian activity, Finegold said.

Students are also planning to launch a new Web site called Israelpride.com, a database of Israel information, currently being set up by Montreal student Eddy Shostak.

Much of the weekend was spent on the nuts and bolts of issues Jewish students face on campuses.

Ambassador Chaim Divon, Israel's ambassador in Ottawa, arrived on Jan. 20 to talk to the students about the current conflict (Shlomo Avital, consul general of Israel for Montreal, took part the following day), while a historical context was presented by Prof. Julien Bauer of the Université du Québec à Montréal.

In addition, Neil Lazarus, who has spent years analyzing media coverage of Israel, led a seminar on "Understanding and Managing the Propaganda." The point was to provide students with the tools they need to counter pro-Palestinian offensive on campus.

Finegold said that although Concordia University has been relatively "quiet" for the last little while, students were preparing for a major resurgence of pro-Palestinian activity on Feb. 7, the day after Ariel Sharon is expected to be elected Israel's new prime minister.

"We know something will definitely happen," Finegold said.

Of the retreat, he said, "I think the biggest accomplishment of the weekend is that is it made us all fully aware of what was going on and that we won't be caught off guard any more... A lot of students have been ill-equipped."

Andrew Elbaz, another Hillel leader who took part in the weekend, said in an e-mail response to The CJN that the retreat "helped eliminate a persecution complex that many students have seemed to have had."

"Instead of yelling and and screaming every time the SPHR (Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights) hands something remotely anti-Israel on campus, it is important to tackle issues pro-actively and concentrate on educating Jewish and non-Jewish students," Elbaz said.

"[W]e are never going to be able to convince SPHR people of what our opinions are.

"Ultimately, I hope that students present at the retreat have become more empowered to make a difference on a pro-active level and to chose to battle wisely."

Côte St. Luc's Jewish character at risk, court told

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Many residents of Côte St. Luc consider that being merged into the Montreal mega-city would be a threat to the area's "distinct" Jewish and anglophone character.

The city is currently asking the court for an exemption based on both the Canadian and Quebec charters of rights.

An injunction has been filed in Quebec Superior Court against Bill 170, the legislation passed by the National Assembly in December which will merge all 28 municipalities on the island into Montreal, until a judgment is made on its constitutionality.

The legal action also challenges the Quebec government's right to force municipal mergers. Côte St. Luc, Hampstead and Montreal West will together form one of the 27 boroughs in the new city and elect two councillors to the 73-member council.

"The abolition of the City of Côte St. Luc and its replacement by a borough that will constitute a point of service of the City of Montreal represents the disappearance of the only governmental institution capable of understanding and responding to the specific needs of this distinct community," argues Côte St. Luc's lawyer Daniel Chénard.

"If the Jewish community built the City of Côte St. Luc, it has equally imbued it with its image and culture."

Since 1970, the large majority of Côte St. Luc's population has been Jewish, he points out. Today, close to 70 percent of its 28,937 residents are Jewish.

Côte St. Luc is home to the largest number of Montreal Jews and represents 22 percent of the total community, according to a 1995 FEDERATION CJA study.

It also has the highest number of Jewish elderly, with one-third of Côte St. Luc Jews over 65.

As part of the legal submissions, Mayor Robert Libman states that he fears that the disappearance of his city could cause Jews and other anglophones to move elsewhere "in order that they can live in an environment respectful of their culture and language."

To illustrate how Jewish Côte St. Luc is, Chénard notes that it is twinned with the Israeli city of Ashkelon; that 15 of its 132 streets and eight of its parks are named for Jewish personalities; and that it has two Jewish hospitals, several synagogues and Jewish schools.

The legal action further notes that, for many years, most of the city council has been Jewish (including all nine current members). Jewish holidays are also respected; municipal programs and even works are scheduled to not conflict with them.

Another distinct characteristic and a reflection of its population's priorities, according to Chénard, is the importance Côte St. Luc places on its public library. It is open 365 days a year, 84 hours a week, and serves as a cultural centre, he says. The city spends $86.06 per resident on the library, the highest rate in the Montreal area. (Montreal proper spends $27.40 per capita on libraries.)

Another priority is its emergency medical service, staffed largely by volunteers, which is unique in the Montreal area.

Chénard contends that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms protects the right of ethnic minorities to maintain and promote their own cultural life, and that municipal government is an "essential institution" for minority communities' "collective and cultural" development.

Bill 170 also violates equality rights outlined in Quebec's rights charter, he continues. Côte St. Luc is one of 15 island municipalities that have bilingual status under the French Language Charter which allows for services to be provided in English when at least 50 percent of its population is anglophone. (In Côte St. Luc's case, about 75 percent is anglophone.)

Loss of this status constitutes a contravention of the anglophone community's rights under the French Language Charter, Chénard argues.

A survey of 500 residents in November found 85 percent have a strong sense of belonging to Côte St. Luc and over 87 percent are against merging into a mega-city. Over 77 percent felt the change would make it impossible to keep Côte St. Luc's "unique and distinct character."

Libman said, under Bill 170, the boroughs will rely on the new Montreal city council for funding, and it is unlikely Côte St. Luc residents will be able to get the same benefit from the library and other services the municipality has created to meet the specific needs of its population.

Patricia Rimok, special adviser on municipal reform to Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque, was skeptical about the plausibility of a legal argument that a municipality has a right to a religious or ethnic character.

Rimok, who is Jewish, said she cannot understand how municipal services can be thought of as distinctly Jewish. What's more, she said, as many Jews will be living in the area after the merger as before.

"We are not in favour of polarizing English and French or Italians, Jews or Portuguese. To go around making yourself so separate from the collective would be a terrible thing."

REACHING OUT: TJA Ohr Menachem has launched a project to raise funds for the earthquake refugees of the Jewish community in El Salvador.

Associated accepting applications for Jewish studies in Israel

TORONTO — Associated Hebrew Schools is currently accepting applications for scholarships to study at institutions of higher Jewish studies in Israel for the 2001-2002 academic year.

Scholarships are granted annually to qualifying candidates through the school's scholarship and endowment fund committee.

More than $14,000 has been allocated for the 2000-2001 academic year to the following students: Jordana Ballas, currently studying at Tel Aviv University; Maor Ben-Ze'ev and Cary Maister at Yeshivat Har Etzion; Rina Goldberg and Elinor Weitzner at Midreshet Harova; Daniel Gryfe at Keren B'Yavneh; Daniel Held at Bar Ilan University; Ahuva Katzman at Midreshet Lindenbaum; Ariella Nagel and Tova Shainhouse at Michelelet Mivaseret; Talia Rosenfield at Michelet Orot; and Joshua Spindel, who is studying at Reishit Yerushalayim.

Qualifying candidates must have graduated from Associated as well as from a recognized Jewish day high school or yeshiva. Special scholarship awards are made to students preparing for a career in Jewish education.

Awards granted are for a single year of study, but students may apply for additional years. Payment is conditional upon the successful completion of the approval program.

Application forms are now available from: Associated Hebrew Schools Scholarship Committee, 6100 Leslie St., Willowdale, Ont., M2H 3J1, or by telephoning: 416-494-7666, ext. 334. The deadline for application submission is March 31.

Dovish talk sparks lively debate in Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two peace activists, one Israeli and the other Palestinian, strongly denounced Israel's razing of Palestinian homes at the Dorshei Emet Reconstructionist Synagogue recently.

Jeff Halper and Salim Shawamreh – both members of the Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions – still hope that the day will come where the two sides can live together in a "win-win" situation.

The event, called A Grassroots Approach to Peace and sponsored locally by Canadian Friends of Peace Now, was unusual for the generally conservative Montreal Jewish community and was marked by some controversy.

According to a report in the Montreal Gazette, pressure was exerted on the synagogue's Rabbi Ron Aigen by the Israeli consulate and by "a major Canadian Jewish organization" to cancel the event.

But Rabbi Aigen denied the report, accusing the paper of "sensationalism."

He said he heard from Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital and from Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec Region Director Philippe Elharrar, both of whom voiced concern that the event might be too "one-sided."

Yet Rabbi Aigen insisted he was never asked to cancel the talk.

"Our synagogue having a Peace Now event does not mean we endorse everything that was said," he said. "It means there's a place in the Jewish community to say it and to let it be debated."

In his introductory remarks, Rabbi Aigen seemed aware of the controversy that might be caused by allowing critics of Israel to speak at his synagogue.

"But it is our strongly shared belief that there ought to be at least one place in the Jewish community for the views of the left to be heard, and even for controversial views to be expressed.

"This is what building a pluralistic community means. It means to tolerate a wide range of perspectives, including some we might not agree with."

Halper, a native of Minnesota and living in Israel for the last 30 years, described himself to the audience of 60 as a proud citizen and lauded his country's overall success as a nation.

But he was also blunt in his criticism, saying the Jewish state has sought to create the impression that it is a partner in peace and is working towards Palestinian sovereignty when it in fact wants to maintain a "matrix of control" over the occupied territories.

It is doing so, Halper said, by building Israeli-use-only bypass roads and by dividing the West Bank and Gaza into "bantustans" – a South African apartheid term – areas under putative Palestinian control but isolated by Israel.

In real terms, Halper said, 60 percent of the West Bank remains effectively under Israeli control.

"Every village, town and city is isolated from the other one," he said.

Halper said that for Israelis, peace "means only quiet... that no buses are getting blown up."

In more halting English, the Jerusalem-born Shawamreh, a 44-year-old construction engineer, vividly described how Israeli authorities twice bulldozed his West Bank home, which he had initially built after two frustrating years of seeking a construction permit.

Seven thousand Palestinian homes have been razed since 1967.

Shawamreh did not blame only Israel for Palestinian problems, however. Since the Palestinian Authority was created eight years ago, he said, the Palestinian standard of living has dropped precipitously and Palestinians have little trust in their leadership.

"There is no trust between the [Palestinian] leaders and its people," Shawamreh said. "Before 1993, we were under one occupation. Now we are under two."

In reply to a question, Halper talked about a "confederation" between Israelis and Palestinians that would reflect the increasing world trend of "regionalization." For peace to exist, he said, Israel has to return to its pre-1967 borders, remove all the settlements and grant a Palestinian state in West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem, which constitutes 22 percent of Israel proper and annexed territory. In return, Palestinians would have to give up their claims on the other 78 percent.

Halper also said that Israel has to "acknowledge" the Palestinian "right of return" and its role in creating the refugee problem.

In his view, the Israeli public would be willing to go farther than either Ehud Barak or Ariel Sharon.

"The Israeli public really wants peace, but they've been saddled with Barak and Sharon," who still think they can "beat" the Palestinians, Halper said.

Twice during the evening, he quoted his friend Shawamreh, who likes to say, "What's good for the Palestinians is good for Israel."

Well-liked MP now Speaker

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Only in an institution as dysfunctional as the House of Commons would club members reject a professional referee to serve as the official Clubhouse referee.

Essentially, that is what our esteemed Members of Parliament did when they ultimately selected Peter Milliken as their new Speaker. Milliken is a fine fellow and we will return to him in a moment. First, however, let's see what messages we can glean from the voting process. The "P" in parliament standing for "paranoid" there are messages in everything that is done in the House of Commons precinct.

The vote went to five ballots. The first thing that this tells us is that no one candidate was viewed as especially attractive – since the natural winnowing process was allowed to determine the final contenders.

Second, we now know that for all their protestations to the contrary, backbenchers – especially on the Liberal side of the House – aren't really committed to reforming the House. If they were, they could have given one of the three reformers in the running an easy victory. Instead, the most likely (and credible) revolutionary, affable Roger Gallaway, was booted "off the Island" in very short order and the other two quickly followed.

We have also learned that even though Liberal backbenchers wanted to tweak the Prime Minister's nose a bit (by not endorsing Chretien's candidate, Bob Kilger), they preferred keeping it subtle... just in case the PM was tempted to impose his own brand of collective punishment on the Liberal caucus. Had they really wanted to stick it to the PM, they would have voted for Diane Marleau (persona non grata at the PMO) or Dan McTeague (persona in vacuo at the PMO).

On a less cynical note, perhaps the most important lesson of all is that within parliamentarians there does indeed exist a compassionate side. Peter Milliken is no doubt the happiest man in Canada right now. For almost as long as he is old, the Member for Kingston and the Islands has coveted this job. He lives, breathes and even dreams in parliamentary Technicolour and has made its arcane ways the subject of a lifelong scholarly inquiry.

On top of all of that, Milliken is well-liked on all sides of the House and has many and enduring ties to the Jewish communities of Kingston and Ottawa. We wish the new Speaker well and much success in translating his personal love for Parliament into feelings that we can all share when considering the House that we have all helped build.

Burquest Jewish community gets new home

By MARLANE PRESS
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — After wandering for nearly three decades, the Burquest Jewish Community Association has a permanent home.

The Burquest Jewish Community Association, which has been meeting for services in various locations for 27 years, should celebrate the High Holy Days in its new setting if all goes according to schedule. Last week, the association closed a deal to purchase a building from a Jehovah's Witness group in Coquitlam. It takes possession on June 28.

"It's terrific," Dov Lank, Burquest's president, said. "People are very excited about it. We can finally put our children's pictures up on the wall and we're pretty pleased about that."

Burquest is named for the Jewish communities of Burnaby, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and New Westminster, yet its members also include people from communities as far away as Langley and Abbotsford.

"The Kingdom Hall will soon be ours. That's kind of amusing," Lank said with a chuckle. "It's a two-storey structure – one building which we're going to do as much with as we possibly can, [and] that means creating a synagogue and a community centre. The one big difference between us and the Jehovah's Witnesses is we're quite convinced we need a kitchen in there. They seemed to have lived 30-odd years without one."

A community without a physical space, Burquest has jostled around from place to place for such things as Chanukah parties, shul services and Hebrew lessons. Lank said that for the past six or seven years, Burquest has been holding services in the social hall of a Coquitlam Anglican church, while Sunday school takes place at Douglas College. Other events are scheduled at whatever locations that can be found that fit the immediate need.

Burquest's frustration with this lack of space led to the search for its own building, Lank said. "We didn't buy this building to increase membership," Lank said, "We really wanted to expand our programming. For example, we want a youth group to get started – but where is it going to meet on a regular basis?"

Approximately 2,500 Jews live in the area and, according to Lank, about 70 households, or 200 people, are formally associated with Burquest. The association, which was brought together mainly by geography, is not affiliated with any of the Jewish religious streams and does not have a congregational rabbi. Though Rabbi Josef Wosk leads the High Holy Days services, "most services are run by our members and they do just a wonderful job," Lank said.

"We conduct our own services, a sort of lay-lead, as the jargon might have it. The services themselves are determined by the interest and orientation of who's running them, but I would generally characterize them as conservative and egalitarian with regard to the roles of men and women," he said.

Burquest has a ritual committee which deals with questions concerning practice and policy, he said, "but it certainly is our strongly stated goal to be as inclusive as we possibly can."

Since the purchase, Lank said he has received a few telephone calls from four or five Jewish families he hadn't heard from before who have now expressed an interest in the association.

"I'm not going to tell you the phone has been ringing off the hook, but we've heard from a few different families who may want to associate themselves and identify with the community," Lank said. "And this area is a real expansion area. It's seen lots of growth and still is growing."

Performing arts centre slated for Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — By next year, Montreal should be the site of the new Judaic Conservatory for the Performing Arts (JCPA), a centre that will offer intermediate to advanced level instruction in uniquely Jewish forms of creative expression.

Founder and president Dr. Hy Goldman, best known for launching KlezKanada six years ago, believes the JCPA will be the only centre of its kind in the world.

Music, voice, dance, theatre, film and video and storytelling will make up its curriculum, which is expected to include both training and theoretical study.

Goldman proposed the idea for such a school two years ago and has been working steadily since then to make it a reality. Although many details remain to be ironed out, Goldman is confident the project is a go.

JCPA has been incorporated and is in the process of registering as a charitable organization. It has an executive director, Devora Neumark, and a board of directors. The YM-YWHA has agreed to house the school for its first session planned for the summer of 2002. And the Jewish Community Foundation is providing seed money.

Perhaps most importantly, the project has captured the imagination of some well-known Jewish performing artists, both locally and from elsewhere in Canada, as well as the United States and beyond.

About 30 of them gathered here on a recent weekend for the JCPA's day-long "first official curriculum brainstorming session." Among them were three members of the American klezmer group Brave Old World (Michael Alpert, Alan Bern, Kurt Bjorling); Klezmer Conservatory Band of Boston members Hankus Netsky and Jeff Warschauer; Oscar-winning National Film Board filmmaker Beverly Shaffer; Toronto comedian Michael Wex; I Musici de Montreal head Yuli Turovsky; director of the dance troupe La La Human Steps, Edouard Lock; concertmaster of the McGill Chamber Orchestra for over 40 years, Yael Hertz Berkson; American filmmaker Josh Waletsky of Image Before My Eyes fame; Yiddish Theatre director Bryna Wasserman; and Sephardi storyteller and academic Oro Anahory-Librowicz.

Goldman wants talented young people to realize that they can aim to play Jewish music or act in Jewish theatre at the same level of excellence other performers strive for.

It is envsioned that the JCPA will be open to accomplished individuals of all ages, Goldman said, and to anyone with an expertise in Jewish culture, regardless of their own background.

Volunteers needed in Winnipeg

Jewish Child & Family Service is seeking volunteers for its Home Activity Program to provide home visits and activities for clients with Alzheimer's. Friendly visitors for seniors, particularly those who speak Hungarian, as well as van drivers to help clients with their grocery shopping are also needed. The Mental Health Program is looking for someone to assist with counselling.

Jewish Federation/Combined Jewish Appeal is looking for a data analyst who can develop and analyse demographic statistics and program an inventory database using Microsoft Access and Excel. An assistant editor for the federation's community magazine and drivers for the Kosher Meals on Wheels program are also required. Escorts and drivers are needed to interact with people on exploratory visits to Winnipeg who are considering moving here.

The Jewish Heritage Centre wants tour guides and educational facilitators to lead tours through the museum and special exhibits. Training will be provided.

The Rady Jewish Community Centre is seeking a leisure buddy to work one on one with disabled children and adults. Drivers to bring seniors to the Stay Young Program are also needed.

Bridge, poker, kalookie players and bingo hosts are in demand at the Sharon Home to work with active seniors. The home is looking for people to help operate the snack bar and assistants to be involved with morning activities at the north location. Russian/Yiddish speaking friendly visitors and musicians/singers to entertain residents are also needed.

Please call Maurene Cohen at 477-7435 or e-mail volunteerbureau@aspercampus.mb.ca.

Montreal Jewish woman dies at 112

MONTREAL — Tillie Propos, who died recently at age 112, was almost certainly the oldest member of the Montreal Jewish community and possibly the oldest person in Canada.

Her eldest daughter, Sair Margolese, 86, said the family has her birth certificate attesting to the fact that she was born in Botosani, Romania in September, 1888. Her maiden name was Berkowitz.

Propos married Abraham Cohen, a tailor, in Romania in 1911 and they emigrated to Montreal in 1913. The couple had four children; besides Margolese, they are Mary Bloom, of Montreal; Joe Cohen of Toronto; and Bebe Welik of Fort Myers, Fla. Propos also had nine grandchildren, 25 great-grandchildren and six great-great-grandchildren.

Widowed at about 53, she would marry two more times. She was also considering a fourth marriage, her daughter said.

"She took good care of herself. Her appearance was very important to her. She put on her corset every day. She always wore high heels," Margolese said.

Propos lived in her own home until her mid-90s, then lived at the Aristocrat Hotel, a seniors' residence. She had been in the Jewish Hospital of Hope for more than 10 years.

She never had a serious illness or surgery in her life, Margolese said. "She never had a wrinkle on her face, and her hair was salt and pepper to the end." She died shortly after breaking her hip.

Genes may have helped. Propos' own mother lived well into her 90s and a sister of hers died at 102.

Propos was a homemaker, and did some charitable work for Mizrachi, Jewish National Fund, and the Hospital of Hope.

Toronto rally draws 2,500

For his part, according to Sharansky, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat understood the importance of Jerusalem to Jews. "That's why he tries to take it away from the Jewish people. He understood that if we [negotiate about] Jerusalem, it's a signal of weakness."

Sharansky pointed out that an estimated 300,000 people recently participated in the biggest rally in Israeli history to demonstrate support for the city's unity. The demonstrators' resolve showed the Israeli political leadership that the "people are full of determination, ready to fight, ready to defend Jerusalem," Sharansky said.

He praised Ronald Lauder, head of the U.S. Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, who spoke at the rally and who was later criticized by some of his constituents at home. Lauder "came to represent the millions of Diaspora Jews who couldn't be there," Sharansky said.

Around the same time in Canada, divisions were exposed over a petition calling for the unity of Jerusalem (The CJN, Jan. 18). Concerns were raised that the local community might be seen as taking a position contrary to that of the government of Israel. The heads of Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) declined to sign the petition – though some officials of CIC and B'nai Brith did. Senior leadership of Congress and B'nai Brith attended last week's rally.

Sharansky stated that Jerusalem, which "saved us and united us for so many years," is again helping unite the Jewish people. "We cannot survive as a people without having Jerusalem."

In earlier remarks, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said the Jewish people must remain faithful to their historic ties to Jerusalem, remain strong and "willing to make sacrifices to maintain our role in her future."

Rabbi Moscowitz said Jerusalem has played a key role in Jewish survival. "We should be among the guardians of Jerusalem even as she continues to guard us."

Rabbi Shulman traced the ancient biblical references to Jerusalem, and pointed out King David made the city his capital 3,000 years ago, to forge "the unity of the entire Jewish people."

Jerusalem, he said, is "the true and only capital of the Jewish nation."

The rally was held under the auspices of One Jerusalem (www.onejerusalem.org), an Israel-based organization with supporters in Canada. The group was formed following last summer's Camp David negotiations to support Israeli sovereignty over a unified Jerusalem.

Yechiel Leiter, director of One Jerusalem, called on rally participants to sign a petition for a united Jerusalem, saying that the Toronto rally would be the first in a number of North American events to push for the city's unity. He later told The CJN that the demonstrations in the Diaspora were non-political and would not encroach on the prerogatives of an elected Israeli government.

Toronto senior enjoys volunteer work in Israel

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Moishe Perlmutar, 78, who ran the Perlmutar bakery in Kensington Market, has been to Israel as a volunteer eight times, and is ready to go again.

"They're watching out for us," is the terse way he sums up his experience at Kitziot, an IDF tank base in the Negev, from which he returned last December.

"If there are problems, we didn't see [them] in the area we were in," Perlmutar said.

"The one [problem] was when we were taken on a trip to Jerusalem, where we visited Yad Vashem and the Israeli Supreme Court, [and] a visit to the Ben Yehuda area of Jerusalem was cancelled because, I suppose, trouble was expected."

Perlmutar, who is often accompanied by his wife Mary, also a volunteer, encourages others to do the same.

On this last trip, which Perlmutar describes as a holiday, he was putting together backpacks and tightening cables on trucks carrying a computer room for tank drivers so that the computers would not be jarred loose if the truck bumped into a rock.

"The work the volunteers do is good, but it isn't hard work," he said.

"Twice before, I worked in a bakery at the bases and they were pleased with my work, but I'll go anywhere they ask me. We don't know where we're going until they pick us up at the Ben-Gurion Airport."

What amazes Perlmutar most is the way modern Israel has changed since he first started volunteering. On his last stint, he was 75 miles south of Beersheva. He contrasted the Bedouin market as it is today with what he remembers eight years ago.

"Today in Beersheva, with its modern shopping mall, you would never know you were in a desert."

One of the things that impressed him was the friendliness of guards at the Egyptian bases they passed on the way to the IDF base.

"The Israeli border there is quite close to Egypt and the Egyptians were always waving to our guys."

Perlmutar's father, Aaron, founded the family bakery and predeceased his mother, Annie, who sold it in 1974. She died in the early '90s.

"At the end, I was running it with three brothers, my mother, my sister-in-law and a couple of extra bakers," Perlmutar said.

Perlmutar had a quintuple bypass at Toronto Genral Hospital 13 years ago, and after extensive rehabilitation, took up racquetball at the BJCC at the urging of his doctor.

Even now, though he plays nearly every day, he plays only doubles, and only on the right side, taking a rest whenever necessary.

"I'm going to keep doing it as long as I can."

NOTICE OF CLAIMS PROCEDURE FOR ASSETS DEPOSITED IN SWISS BANKS BY NAZI VICTIMS

NEW CLAIMS PROCEDURE

A claims process has been established to provide Nazi victims or their heirs with an opportunity to make claims to assets deposited in Swiss banks in the period before and during World War II. The claims process is part of the settlement of the Holocaust Victim Assets class action litigation in the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of New York, Chief Judge Edward R. Korman presiding. Awards will be made by an impartial Claims Resolution Tribunal to claimants that can demonstrate that they or their relatives had deposited assets in Swiss banks in the period 1933 to 1945 that have not been previously repaid to them.

PREVIOUS NOTIFICATION

You may previously have received notice of a $1.25 billion (USD) settlement with Swiss banks regarding Nazi-era claims. Notice of that settlement was published and mailed worldwide in the summer of 1999. The notice included an Initial Questionnaire. If you previously submitted the Initial Questionnaire in this Swiss banks case, and you indicated in that Questionnaire that you intend to make a Deposited Asset banking claim, then you will be automatically mailed a claim form, and you need do nothing further to obtain that claim form. However, if you do not receive a claim form by approximately February 28, 2001, you should request it by one of the means described below.

WHO IS ELIGIBLE TO CLAIM?

Claims may only be submitted to the Tribunal for accounts in Swiss banks owned by, or on behalf of, victims or targets of Nazi persecution. This includes any individual who was persecuted or targeted for persecution because he or she was or was believed to be Jewish, Romani, Jehovah's Witness, homosexual, or physically or mentally disabled or handicapped. There is no fee or other charge for the filing or processing of a claim.

PUBLISHED LIST OF ACCOUNTS THAT PROBABLY BELONGED TO NAZI VICTIMS

To assist claimants in identifying accounts to which they may have a claim, the names of accounts that have been identified as "probably or possibly" the accounts of Nazi victims will be published on February 5, 2001 or soon thereafter (the "Publication Date"). The published list will contain the name of the account holder and other parties to the account as well as the city and country of origin to the extent this information is available from bank records. Interested parties can download this list from the Internet at the official website of the Swiss Bankers Association (www.dormantaccounts.ch); the website of the Claims Resolution Tribunal (www.crt-ii.org); or the website for the Swiss bank claims case (www.swissbankclaims.com).

CLAIMS TO ACCOUNTS OF PERSONS NOT ON THE PUBLISHED LIST

If any name of a person who was a Nazi victim is not on the published list and you believe this person had an account in a Swiss bank from the 1933-1945 period that was not returned, you may nevertheless file a claim with the Claims Resolution Tribunal.

CLAIMS MUST BE SUBMITTTED WITHIN SIX MONTHS

Claimants must fully complete a claim form and submit it to the Claims Resolution Tribunal within six months after the Publication Date. Claim forms can be obtained by calling the following toll-free number: 800-334-6198 (English) or 800-334-6206 (French) or by downloading a copy of the claim form from the Internet at www.dormantaccounts.ch; www.crt-ii.org; or www.swissbankclaims.com. Detailed instructions accompany the claim form.

ASSISTANCE TO CLAIMANTS

Special arrangements have been made to assist claimants. A list of organizations that have agreed to provide this assistance, including their telephone numbers, will be included with the claim form.

Paul A. Volcker and Michael Bradfield, Special Masters appointed by Chief Judge Edward R. Korman to establish, organize and supervise the Claims Resolution Process
